1. The Government of Bihar established the K. P. Jayaswal Research Institute at Patna in 1951 with the object, inter-alia, to Promote historical research, archaeological excavations and investigations and publication of works of permanent value to scholars. This Institute is one of the five others planned by this Government as a token of their homage to the tradition of learning and scholarship for which ancient Bihar was noted. Apart from the Jayaswal Research Institute, three others have been established to give incentive to research and advancement of knowledge,—the Nālandā Institute of Research and Post-Graduate studies in Buddhist learning and Pāli at Nālandā, the Mithilā Institute of Research and Post-Graduate studies in Sanskrit learning at Darbhanga and the Bihar Rāshtra Bhāshā Parishad for research and advanced studies in Hindi at Patna.

2. As part of this programme of rehabilitating and reorientating ancient learning and scholarship, the editing and publication of the Tibetan Sanskrit Text Series has been undertaken with the co-operation of scholars in Bihar and outside. The Government of Bihar hope to continue to sponsor such projects and trust that this humble service to the world of scholarship and learning would bear fruit in the fulness of time.

INTRODUCTION BY THE GENERAL EDITOR

The K. P. Jayaswal Research Institute has great pleasure in presenting this scholarly edition of Abhidharmadīpa and its Vritti which were so far unknown to us either in their original form or through their Chinese or Tibetan translations. The work therefore marks a distinct contribution to our knowledge of Buddhism. Unfotunately the MS of the work was incomplete and so were the photographs taken in Tibet by Mahāpaṇḍita Rahula Sākṁrityāyana. The learned editor Dr. P. S. Jaini, however, has very thoroughly stuided the relevant literature on the subject and given us a work, which will rank high among the scholarly editions of Sanskrit texts.

In his Introduction the editor first gives us a summary of the contents of the Abhidharmadipa in section I and then enters into a general discussion about the nature of the Sūtra and Abhidharma (section II), which isf ollowed by a critical discussion of the relationship between the Sautrāntika and the Ābhidharmika (section III).

The Institute had hoped to publish, earlier than this work, the Sanskrit text of the famous work of Vasubandhu, the Abhidharmakośabhāshya; it had gone to the press earlier and half of it is also printed. Owing to conditions beyond our control, the printing of this work could not be finished before that of the present work. The Abhidharmakośabhāshya and its commentary sphutārthā by Yaśomitra are closely connected with the Abhidharmadīpa and its commentary the Vṛitti. It was desirable that the interrelations between the two should be properly indicated in the footnotes to the text of this work. Prof. Prahlad Pradhan, the editor of the Abhidharmakośabhāshya, readily agreed to his press copy of the work being utilised for this purpose by Dr. P. S. Jaini and this magnanimity of his has enabled the latter to have a fairly long section in his Introduction (Section IV) reviewing critically the major controversies between the Kośakāra and the Dīpakāra, as a result of the comparison of the texts of the works.

In the fifth section of the Introduction the editor deals with the date and the authorship of the work. The extant portion of the MS does not preserve the name of the Dīpakāra. But the editor has adduced sufficient evidence to show that he is most probably to be identified with Vimalamitra a Kashmirian scholar, who according to Yuan Chwang, proceeded to write a work in refutation of the views of Vasubandhu, which probably is none other than the Abhidharmadīpa. The time of the author would thus be between c. 450 A.D. to 550 A.D. The Kashmirian origin of Vasubandhu and Vimalamitra would incidently enable us to realise the deep debt which Indian Culture and philosophy owe to that Himalayan state of the Indian Union.

The three works so far published in the Sanskrit Tibetan Series of the K. P. J. Research Institute,—Pramāṇa-vārtika-bhāshya of Prajñakaragupta, the Dharmottarapradīpa of Durveka and the Ratnakīrti-nibandhāvali of Ratnakīrti deal with logical and philosophical activity of Buddhism in the second half of the first millennium; the present work takes us back to the end of its first half. The philosophical and logical activity of Buddhism was intense, and some of the Buddhist philosophers, owing to their fidelity to the truth, as they saw it were often changing their camps as a result of further and deeper studies. Vasubandhu, the author of the Abhidharmakośabhāshya, offers one striking example in this connection. He gave up his Sarvāstivāda and Vaibhāshika views, as advocated in his earlier work the Abhidharmakośabhāshya, and accepted the teachings of the Mahāyāna, as shown by his later works like the Viṁśikā and the Triṁśikā.

The Abhidharmadīpakāra scents the Mahāyāna leanings of Vasubandhu and calls him a concealed Vaitulika or Nihilist, drifting away from his Sarvāstivāda moorings. There are several controversies between him and Vasubandhu, seven of which Section have been ably reviewed by the editor in his Introduction, IV.

Some later works in Sanskrit dealing with the further development of the Abhidharma are now fortunately coming to light. Abhidharmasamuchchaya of Asaṅga, edited by P. Pradhana Abhidharmakośabhāshya, that will soon be published by this Institute, and the commentary sphuṭārthā published by Prof. Woghihara belong to this category. Prof. Santibhikshu has tried to restore the original sanskrit text of the Abhidharmāmṛita of Ghoshaka from its Chinese translation. The present work is thus the 3rd original sanskrit work of this school to be published and so its importance is considerable to the students of philosophy and Buddhism.

The Abhidharma school merely professed to interpret and expound the sūtras. While doing so by the method of textual analysis, it began to attempt a concordance of diverse Sūtras, (delivered in different contexts) in order to present their consistent and coherent interpretation. This in course of time naturally resulted in a virtual supercession of the authority of the Sūtras by that of the Abhidharma. The former were regarded as conventional and partial, the latter as absolute and comprehensive. The eight-fold path became five-fold, the twelve members of the Paṭichcha-samuppāda became 11. Additions were made to the number of Dharmas, which were probably not warranted by the Sūtras. Novel interpretations were proposed and new additions were made to justify the new views and theories.

This phenomenon will naturally remind us of similar developments in the realm of Hindu philosophy, where the earlier texts of the Upanishads were treated in a similar fashion by the Brahmasūtrakāra and his Bhāshyakāras like Sankara and Ramānuja. The philosophical thought was developing and could not be bottled in the old texts ; both Hindusim and Buddhism adopted similar tectics to reconcile a reverence to the ancient texts with the dictates of their new theories.

Another important point that strikes the reader of the works like the Abhidharmadīpa and Abhidharmakośabhāshya is that while these books show points of contact with Sāmkhya, Vaiśeshika and Yoga,—they do not refute any characteristic views of the Vedantic school. Can we conclude that this school was still in its infancy and had not yet achieved a sufficient prominence to attract the hostile, attention of the Buddhist philosophers?

I am indebted to Prof. D. D. Malvania, the Director of L. D. Bharatiya Samskriti Vidyamandira, Ahmedabad, for kindly seeing the proofs of the Introduction, though he was, then busy at Banaras in connection with his impending departure to the Ahmedabad Institution.

The K. P. Jayaswal Research Institute records its deep indebtedness to the Bihar Research Society, the custodian of the negatives of the Tibetan MSS, for permitting it to publish the present work in its Tibetan Sanskrit Series.

INTRODUCTION

SUMMARY OF THE CONTENTS OF THE ABHIDHARMA-DĪPA

The palm-leaf manuscript of the Abhidharma-dīpa was discovered in Tibet by Pandit Rāhula Sānkṛityāyana in the year 1937. He brought the photographs of this manuscript, which are preserved in the Bihar Research Society, Patna. As the original MS. is not available to us, our only guide about it are the notes made by the discoverer. In his article 'Second search of Sanskrit Palm-leaf MSS. in Tibet',[1] he notes the following details: "Discovered in Ṣhalu monastery, Abhidharma-pradīpa, Ṣāradā script, size 22″×2″, leaves 63, 9 lines in each side of leaf, incomplete. Begins 'svasti, namaḥ sarvajñāya. Yo duḥkha-hetu-vyupaśānti-mārgam......' From leaves 1 to 150, following 84 are missing: 2-30, 40, 46, 48, 50-52, 54-81, 83-90, 119-125, 127-129, 131-133, 138, 140, 145, 147, 149. Every chapter has four pādas. The Third pāda of the eighth (perhaps the last) ends at 150b. The whole book contained not more than 160 leaves........."

The numbers of the missing leaves as well as the title of the book given by the discoverer need correction. After arranging the leaves in proper order, we find the following 88 folios missing: 2-30, 40, 46, 48, 52-79, 81-90, 118-125, 127, 129, 131-3, 138, 140, 145 and 147. The last folio is numbered 150. Thus out of 150, only 62 folios have come down to us.

The name of the MS. given on the label of the photo-graphs is Abhidharma-pradīpa. However, the MS. contains two works, viz., the metrical Abhidharma-dīpa and a prose commentary on it known as the Vibhāshāprabhā-vṛitti. The original work is called Abhidharma-dīpa.[2] The author of this is referred to as Dīpakāra.[3] At the end of each chapter (Adhyāya) and sub-chapter (pāda) the work is called Abhidharma-dīpa.[1] But in two places (p. 347 and p. 429) it is called Abhidharma-pradīpa, which may be an unauthorized improvement by the scribe. We shall, therefore, call the work Abhidharma-dīpa and not pradīpa.

The kārikā text, namely the Abhidharma-dīpa closely follows, both in the contents and in presentation, its counterpart, the Abhidharma-kośa[2] of Vasubandhu. The latter divides his work into eight Kośa-sthānas and adds a ninth Kośa-sthāna, viz., the Pudgala-nirdeśa, more or less as an appendix. The Abhidharma-dīpa,[3] too, is divided in eight chapters called Adhyāyas, but unlike the Kośa, it subdivides each Adhyāya into four pādas. As the MS. discovered is incomplete, we are not certain whether the Dīpa too had a ninth Adhyāya corresponding to the ninth Kośa-sthāna. Most probably the Dīpa had not, for it is not referred to anywhere, even in the relevant parts of the work.[4]

The eight Adhyāyas deal with the following topics in order as in the Kośa :—

I. Skandha-āyatana-dhātu.
II. Indriya.
III. Loka-dhātu.
IV. Karma.
V. Anuśaya.
VI. Mārga.
VII. Jñāna.
VIII. Samādhi.

The Adhyāyas in the Dīpa are not named in the manuscript, but merely numbered. The seventh Adhyāya, however, is named at the end of its fourth pāda as Jñāna-vibhāga.

The number of the kārikās found in the extant Dīpa is 597. Of these 11 kārikās[5] have lost either the first two (a and b) or last two (c and d) quarters, as they come either at the end or the beginning of the lost folios. Two kārikās[1] have a line missing, probably due to the inadvertence of the scribe.

[5] 87, 129, 130, 158, 383, 396, 425, 437, 481, 488, 547.

The distribution of the kārikās in each Adhyāya cannot be ascertained with certainty as most of them have lost certain portions. The fourth pāda of the Adhyāya II (dealing wth hetu, pratyaya and phala), and the first three pādas of the Adhyāya III (dealing with pratītya-samutpāda) are entirely lost. Major portions of the first pāda of the Adhyāya I (29 folios), first pāda of the Adhyāya IV, fourth pāda of the Adhyāya V (7 folios) and the third pāda of the Adhyāya VI (3 folios) and several small portions of the last two Adhyāyas are also lost. As it is, we find the following number of kārikās in each Adhyāya :—

I.	71
II.	78
III.	4
IV.	105
V.	125
VI.	92
VII.	58
VIII.	64
Total	597

Since our extant work is just a little more than one-third of the original, it will be reasonable to presume that the entire kārikā text consisted of at least 1200 verses, covering almost the same topics that are dealt with in the Kośa, which consists of only 600 kārikās[2] (excluding the thirteen kārikās of the Kośa-sthāna IX).

A large number of kārikās of the Dīpa correspond, almost one for one and sometimes word for word, to the kārikās of the Kośa, as will be evident from the comparison given in the footnotes to the text.

[2] 'Abhidharma-kośa-kārikās of Vasubandhu', text edited by G. V. Gokhale, JRAS, Bombay, Vol. 22, 1946.

This correspondence between the kārikās of the Dīpa and Kośa is very striking. Out of the 597 kārikās of the Dīpa, not less than 300 have their parallels in the Kośa. Except in a few cases, (which are noted in the footnotes to the Text), they are presented in a consecutive order. It is possible to determine the subject matter of the lost folios of the Dīpa by referring to the corresponding Kośa. Even in phraseology, they appear almost as imitations of the Kośa. This may be partly due to the common subject matter. But on the whole, one is led to the impression that the Dīpakāra had the Kośa-kārikās as models for his composition.

The kārikās of th Kośa are brief and compressing many points in single verses. Hence we see the Kośa-Bhāshya breaking the kārikās in small pieces for commentary. The kārikās of the Dīpa are usually divided only in two parts.

The number of kārikas in the Dīpa is larger than in the Kośa. This is firstly due to the new topics introduced by the Dīpakāra and secondly due to a detailed exposition of those topics which are briefly discussed in the Kośa. About fifty kārikās are devoted to topics which do not occur in the Kośa.[1] About eighty kārikās[2] are devoted to the topics which are treated only in the six kārikās in the Kośa. It should, however, be noted that the majority of the kārikās of the second kind contains, in most cases, only such details as are given in the Kośa-Bhāshya.

The commentary on the Dīpa, the Vibhāshā-prabhā-Vṛitti,[3] is also written more or less on the pattern of the Abhidharma-kośa-Bhāshya[4] of Vasubandhu.[5]

[5] This work has hitherto been known to us through the L'Abhidharma

There is evidence to show the identity of the authorship of the Dīpa and its Vṛitti. Nevertheless, it is only in the Vṛitti that we meet severe criticism directed against the Kośakāra. It will be proved in a subsequent chapter that this commentary is written solely for presenting the orthodox Vaibhāshika viewpoint, encountering the criticisms levelled against it by the Kośakāra in his Bhāshya. We may here note that although criticising it, the Vṛitti, in most parts, is an imitation of the Bhāshya and differs only in those places where it either deals with new topics or deals in detail with those which are given in brief in the Bhāshya. We have indicated in the footnotes to the Text, the passages common to the Bhāshya. There are about fifty such large passages,—(the smaller ones are not noted)—which are more or less identical with the Bhāshya. Of these about twelve passages are quotations from other works (mostly Sūtras, the Prajñapti and the Jñānaprasthāna) comnon to both.[1] Four passages deal with the chatushkoṭikas,[2] which also appear to be borrowed by both from some common Abhidharma source. Two passages are mentioned as quotations from the Bhāshya itself as providing the pūrva-paksha.[3] The remaining 32 passages are directly borrowed from the Bhāshya without any acknowledgement. Of these a large number are identical and a few substantially agree with the Bhāshya. The entire Vṛitti on the kārikās 17a, 185, 204cd, 209, 261 and 350 of Dīpa may specially be noted as it is identical with its corresponding Bhāshya.

Kośa de Vasubandhu of Louis de la Vallee Poussin, who translated it from the Chinese and Tibetan translations. Fortunately, the original Sanskrit MS. of this work was also discovered by Pandit Rahula in Tibet in 1937. This has now been edited by Professor Prahlad Pradhan and is being printed in the Tibetan Sanskrit Works Series, Patna. I am deeply grateful to Professor Pradhan for giving me access to his press-copy of this MS. I am also indebted to Professor A. S. Altekar, the General Editor of the Tibetan Sanskrit Works Series, for his kind permission to quote and print passages from the above work in my edition of the Dīpa.

Keeping in view this primary relation of the Dīpa and its Vṛitti with the Kośa and its Bhāshya respectively, we may proceed to give in brief the contents of the work. In doing this we will be taking notice only of the more important topics and particularly of those which are either controversial or are not treated in the Bhāshya.

Adhyāya I

[Kārikā 1] The MS. opens with a salutation to the omniscient. The first kārikā declares that the author will compose a śāstra known as the Abhidharma-dīpa. The Vṛitti on this contains a brief survey of the Four Noble Truths, which constitute the central teachings of the Buddha. An etymological discussion of the term Buddha is given to show that he knows all (sarvam, i.e. the twelve āyatanas).

Here the Text is very seriously interrupted as not less than 29 folios, containing a major portion of the first and the second pāda are lost. These lost folios might have contained a very useful discussion on the meaning of the Abhidharma and a detailed scheme of the dharmas set out in their traditional divisios of asaṁskṛita and saṁskṛita and the latter in the five skandhas, further divided into the seventy-two categories of the Vaibhāshika. This is evident from a subsequent statement: vyākhyātāḥ ashṭau padārthāḥ, saṁskṛitāḥ pañcha, trayaś chāsaṁskṛitāḥ.

[Kārikās 2-3] The only point to note here is that the Vṛitti contains a criticism, in this connection of the Vaiśeshika padārthas and the Sāṁkhya prakṛiti, topics which are not referred to in the Bhāshya.

[Kārikās 4-16] The Vṛitti now deals with the āyatana and dhātu-vyavasthā. The meanings of these two terms are given in almost the same words as in the Bhāshya. More detailed information is given about the mano-dhātu and its relation to other vijñāna-dhātus. Two Ābhidharmika terms, viz., saṁgraha (collection) and samprayoga (association) are explained in order to extend the scope of such terms as skandha, āyatana and dhātu to cover many categories which occur in the Sūtras but are not tabulated in the Abhidharma. The traditional list of the 80,000 dharma-skandhas (aggregates of the preachings of the Doctrine) is referred to with various interpretations of this word. The Kośakāra and the Dīpakāra agree that this number corresponds to the 80,000 kinds of people, differing on account of their charita (nature) for whom the Buddha has preached the law suitable to each one of them.

[Kārikā 19] While defining the term sāsrava, the Vṛitti refers to the Kośakāra and criticises his definition of this term. According to the Kośakāra the dharmas included in the first and second Truths are sāsrava, because āsravas (influxes) coincide with and reside (anuśerate) in them. The Vṛitti shows that this is a wrong derivation.

[Kāriās 21-34] The Kośakāra, in dealing with this topic, leaves out many details which are only to be found in the Vṛitti. The Vṛitti here has 14 kārikās (21-34) dealing with the various kinds of vikalpas obtained in various states of mind, and the possibility of memory (smṛiti) in the absence of a permanent entity or soul.

[Kārikās 57-70] At the end of this pāda we find a very bold line indicting the Kośakāra for his omission of an important topic. It reads : "Now this topic, constituting the very essence of the Abhidharma, forgotten by the Kośakāra, should be explained". The Vṛitti in 14 kārikās (58-71) gives various details about the cessation of dhātus through various stages of the anāsravamārga.

Adhyāya II

[Kārikās 72-77] The second Adhyāya deals with the division of the dharmas into 22 indriyas. By indriya is meant aiśvarya (supremacy). The twenty-two indriyas have supremacy over their respective functions. The Vṛitti quotes a passage containing the view of the paurāṇa-āchāryas (which also occurs in the Bhāshya but not so acknowledged), attributing several functions to the five organs, the first five indriyas. The Kośakāra, however, holds that the sense organs have supremacy only over the knowledge of their respective objects, e.g., the organ of eye has supremacy over the action of seeing the matter. This says the Vṛitti, is not a novel theory. Indeed, it is a Vaibhāshika view, and by saying so, the Kośakāra has indirectly accepted the Vaibhāshika contention that the eye comprehends and not the eye-consciousness.

[1] Sakv. p. 64.

The Vṛitti next refers to a very important theory of the Dārshṭānika (i.e. the Sautrāntika), according to whom, no direct perception is possible. It is his contention that perception is not possible, since the object, the sense organ and the cognition are all momentary. This leads to the famous theory of bāhyānumeyavāda closely resembling Locke's doctrine of Representative Perception, attributed to the Sautrāntika in later works like Sarvadarśanasaṁgraha. The Vṛitti, however, does not enter into any criticism of this Sautrāntika position.

[Kārikās 80-87] If the meaning of indriya, is supremacy, why only twenty-two indriyas? There are various dharmas, e.g., saṁjñā, chetanā, etc., which also have supremacy over different mental states. This question is discussed in five kārikās (81-85) It may be noted that the Bhāshya too deals with this topic, but instead chooses other examples, e.g., vāk, pāṇi, pāda, etc.

[Kārikās 92-111] The second pāda of this Adhyāya is very short. It is devoted to various minor details about the indriyas.

It also contains a short but important reference to the atomic theory of the Vaibhāshika and a criticism of the Kośakāra's definition of paramāṇu.

[Kārikās 112-115] The third pāda contains a long discussion on the 46 chaitta dharmas and the 14 chitta-viprayukta-saṁskāras. The Vṛitti gives definitions of these dharmas.

[Kārikās 116-120] The Vṛitti here contains a criticism of Bhadanta Buddhadeva's view that the chitta and chaitasikas are not different dharmas. Buddhadeva also holds that the bhūta-rūpa and the bhautika-rūpa (primary and derived matter) are not different. The Vṛitti makes a reference to its arguments contained in a previous chapter : Bhūta-bhautikānyatva-chintā. This, however, belongs to some lost portions of the Adhyāya I. The Kośakāra deals with this in the Kośa-sthāna I while discussing the bhūta and bhautika dhātus. The Kośakāra, the Dīpakāra and the Theravādins hold identical views on this point.

[Kārikā 123] Of the aniyata (miscellaneous) chaitasikas, the Vṛitti deals in detail only with the vitarka and vichāra. This is one of the major controversial points found in the Abhidharma literature. The vitarka and vichāra are characterised as coarser (audārika) and refined (sūkshma) sensations simultaneously operating in all kinds of the kāmāvachara consciousness. Since these two partake of two opposite natures (audārika and sūkshma), the Kośakāra maintains that these two cannot co-operate in one and the same moment of consciousness. The Vṛitti strongly criticises this unorthodox contention of the Kośakāra. It may be noted that the views expressed in the Vṛitti are identical with the views of Saṁghabhadra, a celebrated Vaibhāshika contemporary of Vasubandhu.

[Kārikās 126-149] The rest of the Adhyāya II is devoted to the discussion or rather the defence of the viprayukta-saṁskāras, accepted by the Vaibhāshikas but strongly criticised by the Kośakāra and rejected by the Sautrāntikas. There are fourteen such saṁskāras which cannot be included among material or mental groups. The Kośakāra argues that these saṁskāras have no independent nature or function, nor are they preached by the Buddha. The Vṛitti provides an answer to this criticism. It is its claim that only such great Buddhists as (ārya) Maitreya or (sthavira) Vasumitra or (āchārya) Aśvaghosha can comprehend the teachings of the Buddha and not those infants who are ignorant of the Abhidharma.

Much of this valuable discussion on the first two saṁskāras, viz., prāpti and aprāpti is lost.

The third saṁskāra known as sabhāgatā, a force producing generality, is defended against the criticism of the Kośakāra, who holds it to be identical with the realistic generality (sāmānya) of the Vaiśeshika.

The next two saṁskāras, viz., āsaṁjñika and the nirodha-samāpatti (forces stopping the functions of consciousness in the realms of unconscious trance) are dealt with in the traditional way. Here too, the Vṛitti launches a strong criticism of the Kośakāra for his 'unbuddhistic' (abauddhīya) theory that these states of trances are not unconscious (achittika) but are conscious (sachittika). This valuable criticism is unfortunately interrupted as one folio containing it is lost.

The next saṁskāra is jīvita, the force of life-duration. The Vaibhāshika holds that it is this saṁskāra which (as determined by the previous karmas), at the time of conception, is instrumental in determining the life duration (sthiti-hetuḥ). The Kośakāra holds that if the karma determines the duration, the function of the jīvita is superfluous and hence has no reality. The Vṛitti puts forward arguments to prove that the jīvita is a dravya, a real element.

The Vṛitti here introduces a very interesting controversy regarding the nature of any possible prolongation of life by yogic powers. According to the Vaibhāshika theory, such a thing is contrary to the laws of karma. The life span (jīvita) is a result of karma (vipākaja), which does not admit any prolongation by samādhi.

This controversy arises from the well known legend of the Buddha's declaration that he could, on account of his mastery over the four paths to ṛiddhi live in the same birth for a kalpa or a kalpāvaśesha.

The Kośakāra fully deals with this controversy while dealing with a topic: kati indriyāṇi vipākaḥ. There the Kośakāra maintains, contrary to the accepted Vaibhāshika theory, that in the case of such prolongation of life by the Buddha (or any other arhat), the yogic powers supersede the karma and produce a new life. It is, therefore, a life which is samādhija (born of samādhi) and not vipākaja (a result of karma).

This view of the Kośakāra is censured by the Vṛitti as uninformed, contrary to the words of the Buddha and unworthy of any criticism. The accusation is even made that the Kośakāra had accepted the Vaitulika-śāstra and had so entered the protals of Mahāyāna.

The Vṛitti next deals with the four saṁskāras known as the saṁskṛita-lakshaṇas or the phenomenalising characteristics of all phenomena. They are: jāti (origin), sthiti (subsistence), jarā (decay) and nāśa (extinction). The Vaibhāshikas, on the basis of a sūtra, conceive that every phenomenal element in its each momentary existence is simultaneously affected by all these four saṁskāras.

The Sautrāntikas hold that as these four saṁskāras have natures opposed to each other, they cannot simultaneously function on a momentary thing. They point out that these four lakshaṇas have no reality as they were spoken of by the Buddha only with reference to the series of moments (pravāha) and not to the kshaṇa (moment).

The Kośakāra openly favours this Sautrāntika view in the Bhāshya. The Vṛitti criticises this nāstika-paksha adopted by the Kośakāra. The last three saṁskāras, viz., nāma-kāya, pada-kāya and vyañjana-kāya (saṁskāras which impart significance to words, sentences and articulate sounds respectively) are discussed in detail in the Vṛitti. The Sautrāntikas maintain that since these saṁskāras are not different from vāk-śabda, i.e. the sound of speech produced from the atoms of sound, it is not necessary to invent such new saṁskāras outside the group of Matter.

The Kośakāra favours this view and ridicules the Vaibhāshika doctrine of the chitta-viprayukta-saṁskāra. The Vṛitti contains an answer to his arguments. It also criticises the Mīmāṁsaka, Vaiyākaraṇa and Vaiśeshika theories of śabda. The Bhāshya does not refer to the views of these three schools.

The third pāda comes to an end with the discussion on the viprayukta-saṁskāras. The fourth pāda containing a discussion on hetu, pratyaya and phala is entirely lost.

Adhyāya III

[Kārikās 150-153] The first three pāda of this Adhyāya, dealing with cosmology are entirely lost. Only one topic of the dissolution (saṁvartanī) of the universe is available to us. A number of controversies regarding the antarā-bhava (intermediate existence between two lives) and the pratītya-samutpāda are thus lost to us, as not less than thirty folios of this Adhyāya are lost.

Adhyāya IV

[Kārikās 154-157] The Adhyāya IV deals with the doctrine of karma. The Vṛitti opens the first pāda with a criticism of the īśvara-kāraṇa-vāda in more detail than the Bhāshya. The karma is divided into its traditional three types : physical, vocal and mental. The first two are further divided as vijñapti ('manifest act') and avijñapti ('unmanifest act'). These two Vaibhāshika conceptions, rejected by the Sautrāntika school, are very pointedly criticised by the Kośakāra in the Bhāshya. Unfortunately, the Vṛitti here is incomplete as several of its folios are lost.

[Kārikās 159-169] The beginning portion of the second pāda is also lost. The Vṛitti here deals with further details of karma. The karma is of three kinds: saṁvara karma (act of abstention from evils), asaṁvara karma (act of indulgence in evils) and naiva-saṁvara-nāsaṁvara-karma (absence from the first two kinds of karma). Of these the first is again divided into three: prātimoksha-saṁvara, dhyāna-saṁvara and anāsrava-saṁvara.

Of these, the prātimoksha-saṁvara is dealt with in detail. The Vṛitti contains an answer to a criticism from the Kośakāra regarding the Kāśmīra-Vaibhāshika definitions of the upāsaka and bhikshu.

[Kārikās 170-187] The remaining portion of this pāda is devoted to the treatment of various kinds of karma divided into several groups of traids. Here too, the Vṛitti closely follows the Bhāshya and borrows several portions from the latter.

[Kārikā 188] The only other notable point in this pāda is a reference to a Dārshṭāntika view. The Dārshṭāntika maintains, on the basis of a sūtra passage, that the kleśas known as abhidhyā (covetousness), vyāpāda (ill will) and mithyā-dṛishṭi are of the nature of karma. The Vṛitti considers this a wrong view since it results in the identity of karma and kleśa. The Dārshṭāntika is here called 'sthitibhāgīya', a term not used either by the Kośakāra or by Yaśomitra. The Vṛitti criticises the Kośakāra for adopting this heretic view, which is contrary to the Abhidharma.

[Kārikās 190-198] The third pāda is devoted to a discussion on the ten karma-pathas (the ways of acting). The Vṛitti gives their definitions, stages of completion and various other details. In this connection it refers to the Pārasīkas who consider it religious to kill their parents and also indulge in illegitimate relationship with their mothers. The Brāhmaṇas are accused of justifying their plunders and the Vedas are condemned as irrelevant talks. The Jainas (nagnāṭa) are criticised for their wrong conception of hiṁsā. It may be noted that this whole criticism is much in the same words as in the Bhāshya. The Vṛitti, however, contains a longer examination of the Yājñika conception of the sacrificial hiṁsā.

[Kārikā 199] The next notable point is a controversy about the destruction of the kuśala-mūla (the basis or roots of goodness). The Kośakāra gives several details about the manner in which the kuśala-mūlas are completely annihilated by the power of wrong views (mithyā-dṛishṭi). It is a Vaibhāshika doctrine that every person is endowed with some kind of kuśala-mūla. But this can be completely annihilated without any residue by the evil powers of mithyā-dṛishṭi. The Kośakāra, however, maintains that the elements of kuśala are never entirely lost, but persist in the form of subtle seeds even in the akuśala state of mind. The Vṛitti quotes this view of the Kośakāra and puts forward the arguments of Dīpakāra supported by the āgama.

[Kārikas 200-222] The remaining portion of this pāda is devoted to other details of the karma-pathas, more or less on the same pattern as the Bhāshya. At the end of this pāda we find a new topic, viz., the karma-svakatā, not mentioned in the Bhāshya. The latter, however, contains discussions on trīṇi āvaraṇāni (three obstructions) and five ānantarya-karmas (actions that find retribution without delay). These topics are not found in the Vṛtti.

[Kārikās 223-230] The fourth pāda is solely devoted to a full discussion of the bodhisattva doctrine. The Pāli Abhidharma works do not even mention this topic. Even the Visuddhimagga makes just a stray reference to the bodhisatta-sīla. The Bhāshya deals with this, but only incidentally, and devotes only four kārikās (Ak. IV. 108-111). The Vṛitti, therefore, is our only Ābhidharmika source for the Hīnayānist interpretation of this important topic.

The Vṛitti contains a long description of the determination of the bodhisattva to help the world by cultivating the bodhichitta and the pāramitās. This is given in a very ornate style, unusual in Abhidharma works, reminding us of similar passages in the Saddharma-puṇḍarīka or the Śikshā-samuchchaya. Conditions attending the first moment of the bodhi-chitta and the acquisition of other excellences are given in detail. The Vṛitti enumerates the thirty-two mahā-purusha-lakshaṇas (marks of a great man) and the eighty anuvyañjanas (the secondary marks) in conformity with their traditional lists. The Bhāshya omits this enumeration, but instead enumerates the names of the sixty sthānāntaras, constituting a kalpa, which are not given in the Vṛitti.

[Kārikā 231] Only four pāramitās (viz., dāna, śīla, vīrya and prajñā), as against the traditional six or ten, are mentioned in the Vṛitti. The Vṛitti informs us that the Vaibhāshikas do not consider the kshānti and dhyāna as separate pāramitās but include them in the śīla and prajñā respectively. The vinayadhara-Vaibhāshikas, it says, read only four pāramitās in the Vinaya. Neither of these views are mentioned in the Bhāshya.

[Kārikās 232-235] Here the Vṛitti introduces a very important controversy, unnoticed by the Kośakāra. It is claimed by some (Mahāyānists) that the bodhisattva-mārga is not preached in the three Piṭakas. The Dīpakāra takes up this challenge and argues that all the essential points (even including the thirty-seven bodhipākshika dharmas) of the bodhisattva path are preached in the Sūtras, and the pāramitās are mentioned in the Vinaya. It is, therefore, a great heresy to suggest that this doctrine is alien to the Piṭakas. Since there are several Sūtras and Piṭakas, the Vṛitti makes it clear that only those words of the Buddha are authentic which are included in the Four Āgamas by the elder councillors like Mahākāśyapa and Ānanda.

[Kārikās 239-241] This leads us to a still more controversial topic of the phala-bheda. If the bodhi-mārga is not different from the Piṭaka preachings, how do we account for the difference in the accomplishments of a śrāvaka, a pratyeka-buddha and a Buddha ? The Vṛitti maintains that the entire preaching of the Lord, which is to be traced to the three Piṭakas, points to the two kinds of Deliverance, viz., chetovimukti and prajñā-vimukti. Both these are equally attained by the śrāvaka, pratyeka-buddha and the Buddha. The difference, therefore, is not in their Deliverance but only in their phenomenal excellences of equipments, faculties and aspirations.

Adhyāya V

[Kārikās 259-261] The fifth Adhyāya is devoted to the exposition of the anuśayas and other minor kleśas. The Sūtras speak of the six basic anuśayas, viz., rāga (bias of passion), pratigha (ill will), moha (infatuation), māna (pride), vichikitsā (doubt) and dṛishṭi (wrong views). In Abhidharma these are further divided into ninety-eight. As Yaśomitra points out, the different schools attach different meanings to this term. The Vaibhāshikas maintain that the anuśaya means paryavasthāna, the Vātsīputrīyas hold it to be prāpti, and the Sautrāntikas consider it a bīja. The Kośakāra examines the first two views and openly favours the Sautrāntika theory of bīja. The Vṛitti borrows that part of the Bhāshya which criticises the Vātsīputrīya, but strongly criticises the Kośakāra for his Sautrāntika bias. The Vṛitti is brief here, as it says, it has discussed this topic in the Karma-chintā (the Adhyāya IV) and also in a work known as Tattva-saptati. This work is unknown to us. It may quite well be an independent work of the Dīpakāra, written on the model of the Paramārtha-saptati of Vasubandhu.

[Kārikās 272-288] The rest of the first pāda deals with several details about the ninety-eight divisions of the anuśaya.

[Kārikās 289-324] The second pāda of this Adhyāya constitutes by far the most important part of the whole work. The fundamental principle of the Sarvāstivāda school, namely, the reality of the past and future elements, is discussed here in opposition to the Sautrāntika arguments forwarded by the Kośakāra in the fifth Kośa-sthāna of his Bhāshya. We are familiar with this controversy through the pioneer works of Stcherbatsky and Poussin. The Dīpakāra takes up each argument of the Kośakāra, reinterprets the relevant sūtras put forward by the Sautrāntikas and establishes, with considerable success, the Vaibhāshika doctrine of the Sarvāstivāda.

Both the Bhāshya and the Vṛitti quote in this connection the four theories advocated by Dharmatrāta, Ghoshaka, Vasumitra and Buddhadeva. But there are a few important points found only in the Vṛtti. The latter refers to the schools of Dārshṭāntika, Vaitulika and Paudgalika and equates them respectively with the Lokāyatika, Vaināśika and Nagnāṭa (Jaina) schools. The Vṛitti quotes Kumāralāta's view supporting the Vaibhāshika viewpoint. It also examines the doctrine of Sūnyavāda, the Pariṇāmavāda of Sāṁkhya, the Avayavivāda of Vaiśeshika and contains a valuable reference to the Tri-svabhāvavāda of the Kośakāra who is described as a Mahāyānist fallen from the Sarvāstivāda.

[Kārikās 325-359] The rest of this pāda deals with different anuśayas obtaining in different states of mind. The Kośakāra is very brief and explains this point by way of an illustration of the sukhendriya. The Dīpa devotes twenty-five kārikās to this topic.

[Kārikās 360-370] The third pāda is devoted to the exposition of other kleśas grouped as āsrava, ogha, yoga, upādāna, saṁyojana, bandhana and grantha. The Vṛitti here differs very little from the corresponding Bhāshya.

[Kārikās 371-383] The upakleśas or minor kleśas collected in the Kshudraka-vastu (corresponding to the Pali Khuddaka-vatthu-vibhaṅga) are dealt with in detail in the Vṛitti. The Bhāshya is very brief and mentions only three upakleśas.

The last portions of this pāda and the entire fourth pāda, containing details on the kleśa-prahāṇa and kleśa-parijña are lost.

Adhyāya VI

This Adhyāya deals with the ārya-mārga or the stages leading to arhatship. A large portion of this Adhyāya, consisting of about seven folios, is lost.

[Kārikās 384-390] The first pāda contains discussion on the darśana and bhāvanā-mārga. In this connection the practices of the four smṛityupasthānas (or application of mindfulness on the nature of the body, feelings, mind and dharmas) are explained in detail, as they alone bring the annihilation of the impurities (kleśa-kshaya). Of these the last, viz., the dharma-smṛityupasthāna is equivalent to vipaśyanā, the analytical insight into the law of pratītya-samutpāda, the central teaching of the Buddha. It is called here 'dharma-mudrā' and is identical with the term 'śūnya'. The Vṛitti, however, deems it necessary to delimit the meaning of this term against the absolutist interpretations, and explains that the saṁskāras are not devoid of svabhāva (own nature) but are only anātma, i.e. devoid of a substance. The Bhāshya does not contain this comment.

[Kārikās 393-438] The practice of the smṛityupasthānas is conducive to the attainment of the first four stages in the darśana-mārga. They are known as ūshma, mūrdha, kshānti and laukikāgradharma. The first is the 'fire' of intuition producing the pacification (śama) of mind. The second is called mūrdha (superior), as it enfeebles the power of mithyā-dṛishṭi and thereby consolidates the kuśala-mūlas. The third is called kshānti where the aspirant achieves unassailable faith in the 'triple gems'. The fourth stage is 'supreme phenomenal existence', so called because it is a turning-point in the career of the aspirant. This stage is comparable to the gotrabhū-chitta of the Pali Abhidharma. This stage is followed by fifteen moments of instight into the Four Truths and culminates in the darśana-mārga known as srota-āpatti or the entering upon the Noble Path. Various details concerning these stages and controversies relating to them are given in the Vṛitti. The remaining three stages, viz., that of the sakṛidāgāmin, anāgāmin, and the arhat, belonging to the bhāvanā-mārga are also dealt with in the third pāda, a major portion of which is lost.

[Kārikās 439-475] The fourth pāda contains an exposition of several kinds of mārgas and pratipats (modes of progress) spoken in the Sūtras. A large portion is devoted to the thirty-seven factors leading to the bodhi. Bodhi, according to the Vaibhāshikas constitutes the two illuminations, viz., the kshaya-jñāna and anutpāda-jñāna, terms which we repeatedly meet in the following Pali passage: 'khīṇā me jāti......nāparaṁ itthattāya'. This bodhi, says the Vṛitti, is of three kinds, viz., buddha-bodhi, pratyeka-buddha-bodhi and śrāvaka-bodhi, giving rise to the concepts of Three Yānas, differing not in kind but only in the degrees of practice of the thirty-seven bodhipakshya-dharmas. These dharmas are then explained in detail in the traditional manner. The only notable point is that the Vṛitti, as in the case of the indriyas, devotes seven kārikās to explaining the reason for not including several dharmas under the bodhipakshya. This topic is not found in the Bhāshya.

Adhyāya VII

[Kārikās 476-492] The Lord has said that this spiritual discipline (mārga) consists of three skandhas (aggregates). 'The śīla-skandha', says the Vṛitti, 'is explained in the Karmādhyāya (i.e. the Chapter IV), the samādhi-skandha will be explained in the Chapter VIII, the prajñā-skandha should now be explained'.

The treatment of the prajñā is more or less on the lines of the Pali Ñāṇavibhaṅga. The Pali works are more elaborate and enumerate a large number of jñānas, but the Sanskrit Abhidharma works (including the Bhāshya and the Vṛitti) deal only with ten kinds, viz., dharma°, anvaya°, saṁvṛiti°, para-chitta°, duḥkha°, samudaya°, nirodha°, mārga°, kshaya° and anutpādajñāna. A large portion of the Vṛitti dealing with these and controversies relating them is lost.

[Kārikās 493-495] The third pāda of this Adhyāya is devoted to the exposition of the eighteen extra-ordinary qualities (asādhā-raṇāḥ-dharmāḥ) of the Buddha. They are ten powers (bala), four confidences (vaiśāradya), three applications of mindfulness (smṛity- upasthānas) and great compassion (mahā-karuṇā). These qualities appear only in the Buddha on his attainment of the bodhi, i.e. the kshaya-jñāna.

[Kārikās 496-497] The treatment of this topic is not much different from the Bhāshya. We may, however, note that a Mahāyānist term sarvākārajñatā is mentioned in the Vṛitti in its description of the sarvatra-gāminī-pratipat-jñāna-bala. Its definition of the term dhātu (in the nānādhātubala) is identical with Saṁghabhadra's definition quoted by Yaśomitra.

[Kārikās 517-533] The fourth pāda deals with jñānas which are not exclusive to the Buddha. They are six abhijñas, three vidyās, three prātihāryas and such other intellectual powers obtained by yogic practices. The only notable point here is the view of the Dīpakāra about the three vidyās which is identical with Saṁghabhadra's view, quoted and accepted by Yaśomitra.

Adhyāya VIII

[Kārikās 534-546] This last Adhyāya deals with śamatha or samādhi. Details about the three kinds of dhyānas (sāsrava, śuddha, anāsrava) and the five aṅgas (vitarka, vichāra, prīti, sukha, upekshā) are given in the first pāda. Various controversies on the nature and number of the five aṅgas, contained in the Bhāshya, are not to be traced in the present incomplete Vṛitti.

[Kārikās 547-554] The second pāda contains controversies on ānejya (unshakable) and four arūpa-dhyānas. The Vṛitti here is rather brief, compared to the Bhāshya. The last portions of the second pāda, containing controversies on the dhyānāntaras is lost.

[Kārikās 554-563] The third pāda contains brief criticisms of the Brahmanical conceptions of dhyātā, dhyāna and dhyeya, and also of the controversy over karma-mārga and jñāna-mārga. It also contains a criticism of the Vedic mantras. The Vṛitti in this connection mentions the mantras of Pārasīka, Śabara and Kāpālika and criticises the casteism of the Brahmaṇas. These points are not found in the Bhāshya.

[Kārikās 588-597] Now we come to the last folio of our incomplete manuscript. This folio contains a brief discussion on the four apramāṇas (boundless states, also known as brahmavihāras), eight vimokshas (deliverances) and eight abhibhāyatanas (stages of mastery) in the same order as in the Bhāshya. The Bhāshya after this deals (in three kārikās=Akb. VIII. 36-38) with the ten kṛitsna-āyatanas. This is followed by five concluding verses in which the Kośakāra says that he has composed this Abhidharma-śāstra conforming to the Kāshmīra-Vaibhāshika school[1] in order to save the Lord's dispensation from growing dissensions and ignorant heretics.

Most probably the Dīpa too came to a close after a few additional verses. It is most unfortunate that we should have lost the last folio which might have given us the name of the author and also a statement of the circumstances that led to the composition of this important work.

II

SŪTRA AND ABHIDHARMA

This brief sketch of the Dīpa and its Vṛitti reflects predominantly the Vaibhāshika attempt to correct the Kośakāra of his Sautrāntika bias. It is, in a way, a record of the dispute between the Sautrāntika and Ābhidharmika on the interpretation of the 'Sūtras' of the Buddha. Before dealing with the specific differences between the two schools, we may here trace the meaning and interrelation of the terms Sūtra and Abhidharma as seen by these schools.

The earliest canonical reference to the term sūtra[2] is found in the Mahāparinibbāna-sutta. It is said there that the Buddha on the eve of his parinirvāṇa laid down the four 'Great Authorities': "In the first place Brethren, a bhikkhu may say thus: From the mouth of the Exalted One himself I have heard, from his own mouth have I received it. This is the Dhamma (Doctrine), this is the Vinaya (Law), this is the teaching of the Master. The word spoken,......should be fully understood and then put beside the Suttas and compared with the Vinaya. If, when so compared, they do not harmonize with the Suttas and do not fit in with the rules of the order, then you may come to the conclusion: 'Verily, this is not the word of the Exalted One, and has been wrongly grasped by that brother'. Therefore, brethren, you should reject it. But if they harmonize with the Suttas and fit in with the Vinaya, then you may come to the conclusion: Verily this is the word of the Exalted One and has been well grasped by that brother".[1]......etc.

[2] The term sutta occurs several times in the Nikāyas. In the Majjhima (I. 133, III. 115) and in the Aṅg. (II. 7, II. 103, II. 178, III. 86, III. 177, III. 361) it is mentioned as one of the aṅgas of the traditional 'navaṅga-satthusāsana'. The term suttanta occurs in the Saṁyutta (II. 267) and Aṅg. (I. 60, I. 72, II. 247, III. 107, III. 178), but not in the sense of a particular collection of the words of Buddha.

This passage, occurring in one of the most important and widely respected sūtras, is very interesting for the history of the authenticity of several Buddhist scriptures handed down to us. It anticipates, even during the lifetime of the Buddha the existence of several different versions[2] and at least one authorized version of the Sutta and Vinaya collections. It is possible that this particular authorized version was accepted as the only authentic one in the First Council of Rājagṛiha, held immediately after the passing away of the Buddha. The omission of the term Abhidharma in this passage, in spite of its occurrence in several other suttas, points to a later period for the composition of the Abhidharma texts, traditionally claimed as the word of the Buddha. The passage itself is silent on the meaning of the terms sutta and vinaya, but from the context we can assume that they are here to indicate the collections of the Dhamma and Vinaya[1] preachings of the Buddha.

[1] See Adv. p. 100, n. 1.

[2] Not of the written words but of the words heard by his direct disciples as, for instance, shown in the Chullavagga: āyasmantaṁ Purāṇaṁ therā bhikkhū etadavochuṁ, 'therehi, āvuso Purāṇa, dhammo saṅgīto upehi taṁ saṅgītiṁ ti'. 'susaṅgītāvuso therehi dhammo cha vinayo cha, api cha yatheva mayā Bhagavato sammukhā sutaṁ sammukhā paṭiggahītaṁ tathevāhaṁ dhāressāmī ti'. 'Vinaya, Vol. II, p. 290.

The exact meaning of these two terms, viz., sutta and vinaya, was still a controversial point even during the time of Buddhaghosa. In his commentary on this passage, Buddhaghosa records several views on what constituted the sutta and vinaya :

> "Here the 'sutta' means Vinaya, as is said : 'Where was this prohibited? At Sāvatthi in the Sutta-vibhaṅga'. 'Vinaya' means Khandhakas, as is said : 'In Kosambi, on the transgression of the Vinaya'. But this explanation does not cover the entire Vinaya-piṭaka. Or 'sutta' means Ubhato-vibhaṅga, whereas 'vinaya' means Khandhakas and Parivāra. In this view the entire Vinaya-piṭaka is included (but not others). Or 'sutta' means Sutta-piṭaka and 'vinaya' means the Vinaya-piṭaka. But here only two Piṭakas are covered (not the third, i.e. the Abhidhamma). Or 'sutta' means the Sutta-piṭaka and the Abhidhamma-piṭaka, and 'vinaya' means the Vinaya-piṭaka. Even this explanation is not satisfactory as there are many works which are not included in 'sutta', e.g., Jātaka, Niddesa, etc. (all books of the Khuddaka-nikāya)".
> "Sudinnathera, however, says : "There is not a word of the Buddha which is not sutta. 'Sutta' means three piṭakas. 'Vinaya' is (only mentioned separately as) a means (of subduing passions)". And to illustrate this he puts forth the following sutta :—"Those things of which you know thus : these things lead to passion, not to release therefrom, these to bondage......these to luxury not to frugality, of these things hold definitely : this is not Dhamma ; this is not Vinaya, this is not the word of the Teacher. But as to those things, O Gotami, which you know lead to dispassion, to release from bondage, to the dispersion of rebirth, to wanting little, to contentment, to solitude, to exertion and to frugality (and in no case to their opposites), be assured that they are Dhamma, the Vinaya and the word of the Teacher". (Aṅg. IV. p. 280).

[1] For a difference between these two terms, see Oldenberg's Introduction to Vinaya Piṭakaṁ, I. pp. X-XIV.

"Therefore", concludes Buddhaghosa, " 'sutta' means the three piṭakas ; 'vinaya' means all that is conducive to the subduing of passion......But those words which do not occur in the tradition of the suttas but appear only in the apocryphal Vessantara, Ummagga, and Vinaya and the Vedalla-piṭakas, or in one of these... they are to be considered as not the words of the Teacher......"[1]

One can see in these explanations an attempt to extend the meaning of these terms and particularly that of sutta. First it is held to mean only a single Vinaya text, viz., the Sutta-vibhaṅga, then a larger Vinaya text, the Ubhato-vibhaṅga. Next it is made to include not the Vinaya texts, but the entire Sutta-piṭaka. Then it is made to include both the Sutta and Abhidhamma Piṭakas, and finally not only all the three Piṭakas, but also anything that may be conducive to a holy life.

The purpose of this extension evidently appears to include the Abhidharma (and also the Khuddaka-nikāya) which is not specifically mentioned in the passage dealing with the mahāpadesas. The commentators are determined to include it and end in giving a very wide and general meaning to the term sutta, thereby making it comprehensive enough to include all good words.

The Sarvāstivādin version of the Mahāparinirvāna-sūtra also contains the mahāpadeśas. They are identical with the Pali passage except for one more significant phrase—"dharmatāṁ cha vilomayanti".[2]

The term dharmatā is quite well known to the Pali scriptures.[3] It is, therefore, difficult to account for the omission of this term in the Pali version. In the absence of any commentary on the Sanskrit Mahāparinirvāṇa-sūtra, we have no precise information on how the Sarvāstivādins understood these terms. Fortunately, our Vṛitti gives some explanation of the term sūtra. It says[4] : only that sūtra is to be accepted which was spoken by the Buddha, collected in the four āgamas by the elder councillors Mahākāśyapa and Ānanda, and which is contained in the Uddānagāthās[1] (summary verses). This explanation helps us to identify the term sūtra with the four āgamas, viz., the Dīrghāgama, the Madhyamāgama, the Saṁyuktāgama and the Ekottarāgama, corresponding to the first four nikāyas of the Pali canon. The Abhidharma-piṭaka and the Kshudraka-nikāya (Pali Khuddaka-nikāya) are not included here in the term sutta, pointing again to their late acceptance as canonical works. Incidentally, it may be noted that in the nikāya classification, Abhidhamma-piṭaka is included by Theravādins in the Khuddaka-nikāya.[2] The Sarvāstivadin meaning of the term sutta appears more accurate and nearer to the original meaning of that term, compared to the several meanings given by Buddhaghosa.

The term 'dharmatā' found in the Sanskrit version of the mahāpadeśas is also at a later period accepted by the Theravāda school. The Nettipakaraṇa, a non-canonical[3] Pali work ascribed by tradition to Mahākachchāna (a direct disciple of the Buddha), contains the term dhammatā along with sutta and vinaya. The meaning of these terms given in this work differs from the traditional Aṭṭhakathās. Its version of the mahāpadesas reads[4]: "...those words and syllables should be put beside the suttas, compared with the vinaya and put alongside the dhammatā. With which sutta are they to be put beside? With the Four Noble Truths. With which vinaya are they to be compared? With the pacification of passion, ill will and infatuation. In which dhammatā are they to be tested? In the doctrine of paṭichcha-samuppāda".[5] [5] Sarvāstivadins also interpret dharmatā as pratītya-samutpāda: [na cha sūtram bādhate] na cha sūtrāntaraṁ virodhayati. [na dharmatāṁ bādhata] iti pratītya-samutpāda-dharmatām. Sakv. p. 705.

[4] Netti, p. 22.

This explanation is remarkable in that these three terms are not identified with any Piṭakas, but only with the general preaching of the Buddha.

Dhammapāla (5th century A.D.) in his commentary on the Nettipakaraṇa, however, reasserts the Aṭṭhakathā meaning of the term sutta. He says : "Since there is not a single word of the Buddha deviod of (the preaching of) Truth, it is said here that 'sutta' means the Four Noble Truths. The Aṭṭhakathās, however, say that 'sutta' means three Piṭakas. There is no contradiction in these two meanings".[1]

Despite the differences on the meaning of the term sutta, the Theravādins and the Sarvāstivādins considered this mahāpadesa as a characteristic mark (lakshaṇa) of the words of Buddha. Our Vṛitti twice quotes this mahāpadeśa to refute views conforming to the Vaitulika-Śāstra.[2]

But the Mahāyānists, agasinst whom this mahāpadeśa was quoted by the Hīnayāna schools, never accepted it as an authority or a standard for judging the authenticity of a particular version of the Buddha-vachana. They had a distinct disadvantage. Though they claimed that their scriptures originated from the Buddha, they could not by the very nature of their teachings, name any śrāvakas like Mahākāśyapa or Ānanda as their compilers. Bu-ston in his account of the rehearsal of the Mahāyānistic scripture says :[3] "Mañjuśrī rehearsed the Abhidharma, Maitreya—the Vinaya and Vajrapāṇi —the Sūtras. It is said moreover in the Tarkajvālā—the Mahāyānistic scripture is the work of the Buddha. The chief compilers of it were Samantabhadra, Mañjuśrī, the Lord of the secret charms (=Vajrapāṇi), Maitreya and others. The śrāvakas were not the chief compilers of our (Mahāyānist) canon, since the latter is not accessible to them".

Haribhadra also in his Aaa. repudiates the Hīnayānist claim of authenticity by pointing out the invalidity of their mahāpadeśas. He says: "There is no concordance between different versions of the Sūtra and Vinaya Piṭakas. The dharmatā established in one school is not identical with that of the other schools. With the eighteen different schools and their separate versions of the three Piṭakas, it is improper to hold the mahāpadeśa as a standard for judging the authenticity of the words of the Buddha.[1]

The same view is held by Śāntideva, the author of the Bodhicharyāvatāra. Prajñākaramati, in his Pañjikā on this work goes a step further. He rejects the Buddha-vachana-lakshaṇa propounded by the Hīnayāna schools and puts forward his valid difinition:[2] "This then is the universal characteristic of the Buddha-vachana as preached in the Adhyāśaya-saṁchodana-sūtra: "Moreover, O Maitreya, by four causes the word of the Buddhas may be recognised. What four? (1) O Maitreya, it refers to truth, not to untruth; (2) to the doctrine, not to the non-doctrine; (3) it lessens sin, not increases it; (4) it shows the advantages of nirvāṇa, does not indicate those of continued rebirth,......When someone, O Maitreya, utters or shall utter a word endowed with these four qualities, the believing young men and women will produce the idea of Buddha, of Master; they will hear this Law as he preaches. Why? Anything, Maitreya, that is well said is a word of Buddha."[3]

This passage reminds us of the Buddha's preaching to Gotamī quoted above. The Hīnayānīstic attitude towards the Buddha-vachana is well summed up in Emperor Aśoka's famous line: "Whatever is spoken by the Buddha is well spoken."[1]

In spite of these different versions and standards, interpretations and doctrines, all the Buddhist schools, both Hīnayāna and Mahāyāna, held some common, indisputable teaching of the Buddha. It was this common heritage that held these schools together through centuries of discord and dissensions. The origin of Abhidharma is to be found in the beginnings of the attempts of the earliest Buddhists to find such a common teaching.

The tendency of the saṁgha to split into various groups is manifest even during the lifetime of the Buddha. In the earlier stages the differences over the laws of Vinaya divided the fraternity. The Vinaya texts are full of stories, invented as well as real, of monks and groups who gave occasion for the institution of several major and minor rules of the Pātimokkha. But the differences over the Vinaya were not considered as harmful as disagreement on the doctrines of the Buddha. During the latter part of the Buddha's life, together with the rise of Devadatta as a rival, we see a kind of fear among the elders that the unity of the saṁgha may not survive the death of the Master.

Several suttas of the Pali canon bear witness to such a fear and to a consequent attempt to preserve the doctrinal unity by putting his more important doctrines in one collection.

In this connection, the Pāsādika-sutta,[2] the Sāmagāma-sutta[3] and the Saṅgīti-suttanta[4] may be noted as of particular interest. The death of the Jain leader Nātaputta Nigaṇṭha and a subsequent division in his saṁgha form the occasion for these three suttas.

It is said in the introduction (nidāna) to the Pāsādika sutta: "While the Lord was staying among the Śākyans, Nātaputta the Nigaṇṭha had died recently at Pāvā. At his death, the Nigaṇṭhas became disunited and divided into two parties, in mutual strife and conflict, quarrelling......with each other......—thou dost not understand this doctrine (dhamma) and discipline (vinaya) but I do understand it. Thou art in the wrong; I am in the right; ......Thou sayest last what should be said first, and first what ought to come last; ......Truly the Nigaṇṭhas......were out, methinks, to kill. Even the lay disciples......showed themselves shocked...... so badly was their doctrine and discipline set forth and imparted ......and now wrecked as it was......without a protector."[1]

Now Chunda the novice who had seen this, visited Ānanda at Sāmagāma and reported it to him. And Ānanda said, "Friend, this is a worthy subject to bring before the exalted one". They went to the Lord and reported the episode. The Buddha was not surprised to learn the happening. He gives a long discourse on the nature of a perfect Teacher, on the conditions of a perfect religion and claims that his is the perfect saṁgha and the exalted Law. He then sums up his teachings and exhorts the saṁgha in the following words: "Wherefore, Chunda, do ye, to whom I have made known the truths that I have perceived, come together in company and rehearse all of you together those doctrines and quarrel not over them, but compare meaning with meaning, and phrase with phrase, in order that this pure religion may last long......".[2]

"Which then, Chunda, are the truths which, when I had perceived I made known to you......? They are these—the Four Onsets of Mindfulness, the Four Supreme Efforts, the Four Paths to Efficacy, the Five Powers, the Five Forces, the Seven Factors of Enlightenment, the Ariyan Eightfold Path. These O Chunda, are the truths......"[1]

The Sāmagāma sutta also begins with the same episode of the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta's death. Here Ānanda relates this to the Buddha adding his hope that when the Lord dies, no 'similar' quarrels will arise in the saṁgha, to the grief and sorrow of gods and men.

The reply of the Buddha on this occasion is worth noting here. He repeats the dhammas preached in the last sutta and asks: "What think you Ānanda? Do you observe even a couple of Bhikkhus at variance about the truths which, when I had perceived, I made known to you......, the Four Onsets of Mindfulness......the Ariyan Eightfold Path?"

"No Sir. But those who are about the Lord might, at his death, stir up quarrels in the saṁgha respecting the rigours of the regimen or of the code. Such quarrels would make for the grief and sorrow of the gods and men".

"Of little concern, Ānanda, are quarrels respecting rigours of regimen or of the code, it is possible quarrels in the confraternity about the Path or the course of training which really matter".[2] Here we can discern the rise of Abhidharma, the supreme Doctrine of the Buddha. The statement that there are no two opinions on the thirty-seven items, raises the latter to a higher degree and can be called the central and universally accepted preaching of the Buddha. The differences rising out of the Vinaya are not ruled out, but they are not exaggerated. No particular sutta is mentioned as the supreme, but only the sum total of all the teachings put into an aggregate later known as the bodhipakkhiyā dhammā. It is the burden of a large number of suttas in the Dīgha and Majjhima Nikāyas. It constitutes one of his last preachings to the congregation, following the declaration of his intention of entering into parinirvāṇa[1]. The Milindapañha almost makes a generalisation by saying that all Tathāgatas, when they preach, preach these thirty-seven (bodhipakkhiya) dhammas.[2] It is said in the Saddharma-puṇḍarīka that the career of a bodhi-sattva is completed by practising these dharmas.[3] Almost all major works on Buddhism, both Hinayāna and Mahāyāna, contain this list. This, therefore, was the supreme dharma, acceptable to all. It marks the beginning of the Abhidharma.

The term 'bodhipakkhiyā dhammā' appears only in a few places in the older Nikāyas. In the Aṅg. N. it is mentioned without indication of the scope of the term.[4] In the Saṁyutta N. it is applied to the five indriyas (saddhā......paññā).[5]

The term occurs in the Aggañña sutta, where it consists of seven dhammas only.[6] It occurs twice in the Vibhaṅga and there too it consists of the seven bojjhaṅgas.[7] In the same book, the thirty-seven items are called saddhamma.[8] In the Jātakaṭṭhakathā these thirty-seven are called both saddhammā and bodhipakkhiyā dhammā.[9] The Visuddhimagga enumerates the thirty-seven dhammas as bodhipakkhiyā and discusses them in detail.[10] The Netti-pakaraṇa once speaks of thirty-seven[11] and in an other place adds seven saññās[12] to the thirty-seven, bringing the number of the bodhipakkhiyas to forty-three.[13]

The same thirty-seven items, called bodhipakshyāḥ or bodhipākshikāḥ dharmāḥ, are also found in most of the Buddhist Sanskrit scriptures.[1] It is possible that the seven bojjhaṅgas formed the nucleus of this collection, to which were added other dharmas. The overlapping character of several items—e.g., the five balas again grouped under the five indriyas—was recognized by the commentators. Concequently we find both in the Kośa and in the Dīpa, as well as in the Abhidhammattha-saṅgaho of Anuruddha, an attempt to delimit the term to contain only ten, eleven or fourteen dharmas.[2]

This tendency to collect the most repeated and advanced teachings of the Buddha and group them in several clusters is common to many suttas of all five nikāyas.

The Mahāsatipaṭṭhāna-sutta[3] is a long discourse on the four satipaṭṭhānas and four ariya-sachchas. The Mahānidāna-sutta[4] is devoted to a long discussion on the twelve aṅgas of the paṭichcha-samuppāda. The Chhachhakka-sutta[5] is purely catechetical in that it deals with six groups of sixes (chhakkas). The Bahudhātuka-sutta[6] is composed solely to collect all 'dhātus' scattered in various suttas. Instead of the usual eighteen, we here find an enumeration of forty-one dhātus. The Mahāsukuludāyi-sutta[7] contains a larger number of items. In addition to the traditional thirty-seven items, there are mentioned eight vimokkhas, eight abhibhāyatanas, ten kasināyatanas, four jhānas and six abhiññās. These topics are found fully discussed in all Abhidharma works.[8]

A whole series of suttas with the appellation 'vibhaṅga'[9] are found in the Vibhaṅgavagga of the Majjhima-nikāya. They are (1) Chūḷakamma-vibhaṅga, (2) Mahākamma-vibhaṅga, (3) Saḷāyatana-vibhaṅga, (4) Uddesa-vibhaṅga, (5) Araṇa-vibhaṅga (6) Dhātu-vibhaṅga, (7) Sachcha-vibhaṅga, and (8) Dakkhiṇā-vibhaṅga.

The term vibhaṅga is significant. It means distribution, division or classification. It also means expansion (of a meaning), i.e. a commentary. Vibhaṅga is also a name of the second Abhidhamma Book, which is more or less a continuation and expansion of the dhammas collected in the Dhamma-saṅgaṇi. These two ābhidhammika functions, namely the collection and expansion, characterise these vibhaṅga-suttas and mark the second stage in the development of the Abhidharma.

Several suttas of the Saṁyutta-nikāya can also be called pure Abhidhamma. The Nidāna-saṁyutta[1] has several suttas dealing only with the paṭichchasamuppāda. The Dhātu-saṁyutta[2] deals with all kinds of dhātus and gives their traditional definitions. The Khandha-saṁyutta[3] contains details of all khandhas. The Saḷāyatana-saṁyutta[4] and particularly the Saṭṭhi-peyyala deal with āyatanas, with the triple doctrine (anichcha, dukkha, anattā) applied to them. The Sāriputta[5] and the Moggallāna-saṁyuttas[6] are long discourses on the rūpa and arūpa-dhyānas, given in the stereotyped formulas repeated all over the Nikāyas. The Asaṁkhata-saṁyutta[7] deals with nirvāṇa. The last Book of the Saṁyutta-nikāya, viz., the Mahāvagga, deals with magga, i.e. the thirty-seven (bodhipakkhiya) dhammas. There are seven separate saṁyuttas dealing with the seven main items of these bodhipakkhiyas.[8]

The Aṅg. nikāya. due to its method of numerical order comes much closer to the books of Abhidhamma. The dhammas scattered all over the other Nikāyas find repetition here in an artificial group of numbers. Two books of the Khuddaka-nikāya, viz., the Uddesa and the Paṭisambhidā-magga are pure Abhidhamma works, though grouped in the Sutta-piṭaka. Of these, the Paṭisambhidā-magga is attributed by tradition not to the Buddha but to Sāriputta. It is said in its commentary that this work was preached by Sāriputta to Ānanda, who recited it before the first Council.[1]

This review shows us the tendency of certain Suttas of all the Nikāyas towards collecting and classifying, and at times elaborating the advanced teachings of the Buddha. Several of these Suttas are not the direct words of the Buddha, but elaborations by his chief disciples like Sāriputta and Moggallāna on an uddesa or synopsis laid down by the Buddha.[2] These categories or dhammas can be summed up in such oft-repeated technical terms as khandha, dhātu, āyatana, indriya, sachcha, paṭichcha-samuppāda, kamma, kilesa, magga, the items of the thirty-seven bodhipakkhiya-dhammas, jhāna, the eight vimokkhas, eight abhibhāyatanas, ten kasinas, saññās, etc. The collective name for all these dhammas is 'abhidhamma', as they are 'abhi' visiṭṭhā dhammā'. The contents of all the major works on Abhidhamma, including the Kośa and Dīpa, do not, in essence, differ from these few topics, scattered here and there throughout the Sutta-piṭaka.

Now we turn to the Saṅgīti suttanta, which marks a definite start of the Abhidhamma literature proper, in the Sutta-piṭaka. This sutta also opens with an account of the Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta's death. This time Chunda or Ānanda do not report it to the Buddha, but Sāriputta himself relates it to the saṁgha, in the presence of the Master: "The Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta, friends, has just died at Pāvā. Since his death the Nigaṇṭhas have become divided and have fallen into opposite parties and into strife......But to us, friends, the Norm has been well set forth and imparted by the Exalted One. Herein there should be a chanting by all in concord, not a wrangling, that this holy life may persist and be long maintained. That may be for the welfare and happiness... of devas and of men".[1]

[2] For instance, the Sachcha-vibhaṅga-sutta and the Uddesa-vibhaṅga-sutta.

This historical introduction is followed by a long list of 227 kinds of dhammas presented in the numerical order of ones, pairs, triads, etc. up to tens, covering 903 dhammas in all. At the end of each numerical section is repeated the exhortation to 'chant in concord' and not to wrangle.

The last sutta of the Dīgha-nikāya, viz., the Dasuttara-sutta also follows the same pattern. But it has no story to tell. It opens with a declaration by Sāriputta that he will propound the groups one to ten. The division of the dhammas here is made not only on their numerical order but also in consideration of their nature.

These two suttas can very fairly be compared with the Mātikās of the Abhidhamma, given in the beginning of the Dhamma-saṅgaṇi. In fact, the Suttanta-mātikā given there is almost identical with the dukas (pairs) occurring in the Saṅgīti-suttanta. The former gives forty-two pairs of which thirty-two are the same as in the latter. Several items of the Tika-mātikā also are common with the Tika-dhammas of both the Saṅgīti and the Dasuttara suttantas.

The ābhidharmika character of these two suttas was long ago noted by T. W. Rhys Davids in his translation of the Dīgha-nikāya: "All that we know is that each of them forms a sort of thematic index to the doctrines scattered through the Four Nikāyas......In the two features they have in common, of catechism as a monologue by the catechuman; and of the absence of narrative, this further interest attaches to these last suttantas, that they become practically Abhidhamma rather than Sutta-piṭaka."[2]

This observation is further confirmed by the fact that the Saṅgīti-suttanta happens to be one of the seven Abhidharma works of the Sarvāstivāda school. This work is there known as Saṅgīti-paryāya, now preserved only in its Chinese and Tibetan translations. The researches of J. Takakusu[1] have revealed that the Chinese translation of this work attributes this sūtra to Sāriputra[2] and contains the same episode of Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta's death, which hastened Śāriputra (or the compilers of this sūtra) to draw up a summary of the Doctrines, which subsequently came to be called the Abhidharma.

[2] Dialogues of the Buddha, III. p. 199.

So far we have seen the abhidhamma in its one aspect, viz., the visiṭṭhā dhammā. The abhidhamma in the Sutta-piṭaka consists mainly of the collection of dhammas in different groups as khandha, āyatana, dhātu, indriya, sachcha, paṭichcha-samuppāda, jhāna, magga, etc. Another aspect consists in the minute analysis of these dhammas into various units. The method of the Buddha's preaching is characteristically analytical. His first sermon, the Dhamma-chakka-ppavattana-sutta, is followed by a preaching devoted solely to an analysis of Personality into the five aggregates (khandhas) and the latter again in their various triple aspects as past, future, and present; and dual aspects as personal and external, gross and subtle, low and exalted, far and near.[3] The bodhi of the Buddha also consists of his knowledge of the doctrine of paṭichcha-samuppāda, which again is an analysis of the series of causes of the cycle of birth and death. From this analytical and critical consciousness arise his unique doctrines of anityavāda (momentariness), anātmavāda (impersonality) and śūnyavāda (unsubstantiality) which distinguish Buddhism from other Indian schools of thought. The preaching of these unique doctrines is called his sāmukkaṁsikā dhamma-desanā (exalted sermon) as opposed to his anupubbikā dhamma-desanā[1] (graduated sermon) of charity and morals. It is the knowledge of these higher dhammas (doctrines) described as profound, subtle, difficult to comprehend, transcending mere speculation, capable of being known only by the wise, which he claims as the result of his attaining the supreme enlightenment (samyak sambodhi).

This analysis of the dhammas is another aspect of Abhidhamma.

It is said in the Vinaya-piṭaka that a monk who is incapable of instructing abhidhamma and abhivinaya must not take part in ordaining a disciple.[2] Commenting on these two terms, Buddhaghosa says: "Abhidhamma means dividing (the dhammas) as mind and matter. Abhivinaya means the entire Vinaya-piṭaka."[3]

This piece of commentary is valuable for defining in brief the function and method of Abhidhamma. The contents of this term are shown by taking it to mean the 'visiṭṭhā dhammā. Its analytical method and its specialised field of operation are shown by its discription as 'nāma-rūpa-parichchheda'. It is parichchheda, i.e. division, classification or analysis which characterises the method of Abhidhamma. It is not sīla or samādhi as in the general dhamma preachings, nor āpatti and anāpatti as in the Vinaya preachings, but nāma and rūpa that constitute the basic sphere of Abhidhamma.

The Sarvāstivādins also attribute the same function to Abhidharma. Vasubandhu defines it as amalā prajñā—the pure wisdom—and interprets it as dharma-pravichaya, analysis of dharmas as sāsrava and anāsrava, etc. This is the real abhidharma: the term is only secondarily applied to the Abhidharma-śāstras, as the latter are helpful in attaining the prajña.[4]

[4] Akb. I. 2ab.

The bodhi of the Buddha consists of this dharma-pravichaya or the nāma-rūpa-parichchheda, which is fully elaborated in the Abhidharma.[1] It is to impart this that he preaches Abhidharma to his disciples.[2] It is not only a means to attain nirvāṇa, but also an end, indeed arhatship itself.

The analysis of the nāma and rūpa and particularly of nāma, i.e. the mind and mental dhammas, dominate the entire preachings of the Buddha. The doctrines of karma, rebirth and salvation are all explained on the basis of the analysis of the mind in its good, bad and indeterminate states. His oft-quoted saying, "Beings suffer on account of the impure mind; they are freed by the purification of the mind,"[3] can be pointed to as a good example. of this analysis. A study of the mind and its functions with reference to its different objects in various states of existence, a minute observation of the various kinds of feelings, volitions and other concomitants that associate with those states and an analysis of the complex network of causes that lead to such combinations are to be found in various suttas, in several repeatedly occurring passages that deal with jhānas, paṭipadās, abhiññās and the bodhipakkhiya-dhammas. The analysis of the matter is also given in the Suttas to the extent that is necessary to understand the role it plays as an object of the mind and also to comprehend its mysterious co-operation with the mind in giving effect to a corporeal life. A large number of suttas emphasise the need of this analytical consciousness. We may particularly note here the Satipaṭṭhāna-sutta of the Dīgha-nikāya. The practice of the contemplation of the nature of body (kāya), feelings (vedanā), mind (chitta) and dhammas is spoken by the Buddha as the one and only way of leading to the purification of beings and the realization of nibbāna.[4]

We have noted above the attempts by the Elders towards collecting the visiṭṭhā dhammā in several groups. At a later time, we find works like the Khuddaka-pāṭha, containing lists enumerating the three saraṇas, sikkhāpadas, kammaṭṭhānas and such other items useful for novices. It is possible that several units into which these dhammas were further analysed by the Buddha, were also tabulated (quite possibly with the approval of the Master) by elders like Sāriputta, Moggallāna, or Mahākachchāyana, famous for their ability to expound the words of the Buddha, for the benefit of monks engaged in higher studies of the dhammas. Such tabulations called Mātikās, were certainly known to the early Buddhists. It is said in the Gulissāni-sutta of the Majjhima-nikāya that a bhikkhu living in forests should apply himself to abhidhamma and abhivinaya.[1] The commentary on this passage says: "He should apply himself to the study of the Abhidhamma-piṭaka and the Vinaya-piṭaka, together with their Commentaries. As regards the Abhidhamma, he should at least know the Duka and Tika Mātikās together with the Dhamma-hadaya-vibhaṅga (last chapter of the Vibhaṅga). As regards the Vinaya-piṭaka, he must at least learn the two Pātimokkhas."[2]

Leaving aside this commentorial identification of the term adhidhamma with the Abhidhamma-piṭaka as merely traditional, we may note its emphasis on the two Mātikās.

The Mātikās are tabulations of the topics of Abhidhamma given in the Dhammasaṅgaṇi,[3] the first book of the Abhidhamma-piṭaka. There are two Mātikās given at the beginning of this book, viz., the Tīka-mātikā, and the Duka-mātikā.

The first, viz., the Tīka-mātikā consists of twentytwo triads headed by the triplet of dhammas that are good (kusalā), bad (akusalā) and indeterminate (abyākatā). The arrangement of these triplets is on the principle of grouping the dhammas in three mutaully exclusive sets which, when put together, in some cases comprehend all nāma dhammas and in others comprehend both the nāma and rūpa dhammas. Six of these twenty-two triplets (Nos. 2, 7, 13, 16, 19 and 21) cover only the nāma. The remaining sixteen triplets cover the entire range of phenomena, i.e. the nāma and rūpa. An inspection of these sixteen triplets reveals that they cover not only the phenomena, but also the nibbāna, called asaṁkhatā dhātu (the Uncompounded element), which is included in the nāma.[1]

The second Mātikā, namely the Duka-mātikā, is divided into two: Abhidhamma-mātikā and Suttanta-mātikā. The former consists of one hundred pairs collected in thirteen groups. Ten of these groups are called 'clusters' (gochchhakas). They deal with ten kinds of Corruptions and dhammas that enter into various relationships with them. The remaining three groups, called Chūḷantara-duka (Short Intermediate set of seven pairs), Mahantara-duka (Great Intermediate set of fourteen pairs) and Piṭṭhi-duka (Supplementary set of eighteen pairs) treat of miscellaneous pairs of dhammas. A large number of pairs of the Mahantara-duka deals with the mutual relation of chitta and chetasikas. The first nine of the eighteen pairs of the Piṭṭhi-duka are borrowed from the Tika-mātikā. This last duka closes with the pair of dhammas which are saraṇa and araṇa. Although the gochchhakas occupy a large portion of these dukas, the remaining three appear to be older. The latter contain several items common to the Mātṛikas of the Sanskrit Abhidharma. The gochchhakas are found only in the Pali Abhidhamma.

The second division of the Duka-mātikā is called Suttanta-mātikā. It contains a list of forty-two pairs, mostly of miscellaneous nature and dealing more with dhammas related to sīla, samādhi and diṭṭhi than with nāma and rūpa as in the Abhidhamma-mātikā. We have already noted that thirty-two of its forty-two pairs are identical with the duka-dhammas given in the Saṅgīti-suttanta of the Dīgha-nikāya. It may well be that it is called Suttanta-mātikā because it was directly borrowed from the Saṅgīti-suttanta.

No corresponding Mātrikas of the Yogāchāra and the Sarvāstivāda schools have come down to us. But it is possible to reconstruct such a list on the basis of the items dealt with in their Abhidharma works.[1] The Abhidharma-samuchchaya of Asaṅga (representing the Yogāchāra school), the Kośa-Bhāshya of Vasubandhu and the present work Dīpa (with its Vṛitti), contain an almost identical set of pairs and traids corresponding to the Mātikās of the Theravāda school.

The Abhidharma-samuchchaya of Asaṅga deals with a large number of dharmas in its first chapter devoted to a study of skandha-āyatana-dhātu (tri-dharma-parichchheda). Its method, like other Abhidharma works, is catechetical. The dhammas in the Abhidharma-samuchchaya are presented in the following order :—

1	(a) dravyamat	(b) prajñaptimat
2	(a) saṁvṛitisat	(b) paramārthasat
3	(a) jñeyam	(b) vijñeyam

These sixteen pairs are followed by the following five triads:-

[1] On the development of the Abhidharma and the mātṛikas, see A Bareau, Dhammasaṅgaṇi, Paris 1951, pp. 6-40.

[2] These numbers in the brackets refer to the number of corresponding items of the Pali mātikā given in the Dhammasaṅgaṇi (Poona edition).

21	(a) darśana-prahātavyam	(b) bhāvanā°—	(c) aprahātavyam	(9)

These triads are interrupted by a long discussion on pratītya samutpāda and pratyayas. Lastly the following pairs are enumerated :—

22	(a) sabhāgam	(b) tatsabhāgam
23	(a) savipākam	(b) avipākam	(3)
24	(a) sottaram	(b) anuttaram—	(121)

We can see from this list that the Abhidharma-samuchchaya deals with nineteen pairs and five triads. Of these, twelve pairs and all triads have their parallels in the Pali Mātikās.

The same method is followed in the Kośa (and Bhāshya). In its first Kośa-sthāna (dealing with skandha-āyatana-dhātu), dharmas are presented in the following order :—

1	(a) sāsrava	(b) anāsrava		(37)
2	(a) saṁskṛita	(b) asaṁskṛita		(30)
3	(a) sanidarśana	(b) anidarśana		(31)
4	(a) sapratigha	(b) apratigha		(32)
5	(a) kuśala	(b) akuśala	(c) avyākṛita	(1)
6	(a) kāmadhātupratisaṁyukta	(b) rūpa°	(c) ārūpya°	(115-7)
7	(a) savitarka-vichāra	(b) vichāra-mātra	(c) avitarka-avichāra	(6)
8	(a) sālambana	(b) anālambana		(77)
9	(a) upātta	(b) anupātta
10	(a) bhūta	(b) bhautika	(c) nobhaya
11	(a) saṁchita	(b) asaṁchita
12	(a) vipākaja	(b) aupachayika
13	(a) adhyātma	(b) bāhya		(88)
14	(a) sabhāga	(b) tatsabhāga
15	(a) darśana-heya	(b) bhāvanā-heya	(c) aheya	(8)
16	(a) dṛishṭi	(b) na dṛishṭi
17	(a) dāhaka	(b) dāhya
18	(a) tulya	(b) tolayitṛi

In the III Kośa-sthāna, the indriyas are divided only in four triads (the same as Nos. 5, 6, 15 and one more, i.e. No. 19).

19	(a) sāsrava	(b) anāsrava	(c) ubhaya	(37)
20	(a) vipāka	(b) na-vipāka
21	(a) savipāka	(b) avipāka

Thus in the Kośa we find six triads and fifteen pairs of these four triads and eight pairs have their parallels in the Pali Mātikās.

Almost the same pairs and triads are given, in the same order, in the Dīpa and its Vṛitti. For both the Bhāshya and the Vṛitti, the main purpose is to deal with the dharmas in accordance with these mātṛikas. All discussions on the doctrine valuable as they are from our point of view are treated as incidental.

This account of the four major works on Abhidharma shows that the Yogāchāra and the Sarvāstivāda schools too had Mātṛikās, similar to the Pali Mātikās. The numbers of items of both pairs and triads varied in each school. It is probable that originally the mātikā list consisted of a few items, only of those which are included in all these four Abhidharma works. The following table shows the number of items treated in the following three schools :

	Theravāda (Dhs.)	Yogāchāra (Asm.)	Vaibhāshika (Kośa)
Triads	22	5	6
Pairs	100 excluding the Sattanta-mātikā	22	15

Considering the overlapping character of the several pairs and triads in the Pali Mātikās, it appears to us that the Vaibhāshika list is more original and has suffered less additions. The Yogāchāra list is also nearer to the Vaibhāshika list than to the Pali Mātikās. Though as many as twenty-three triads and a hundred pairs are given in the Pali Mātikās, it should be noted that only the first traid namely the kusala tika, has been fully expanded in the Dhamma-saṅgaṇi. The entire Chittuppāda-kaṇḍa and even the Rūpa-kaṇḍa (which is covered by the term abyākatā dhammā) deal with the mind and matter, only with reference to the first tika. The Rūpa-kaṇḍa has its own Mātikā, which consists not only of pairs and triads, but also of fours, fives, etc., up to tens, like the collection of dhammas in the Sangīti-suttanta. The remaining twenty-two tikas and the entire duka-mātikā are briefly explained in the Nikkhepa-kaṇḍa, which is a sort of commentary on the Mātikās.

Whatever the original contents of the Mātikās may have been, there is no doubt that it formed the nucleus of the Abhidhamma literature,[1] both Pal and Sanskrit. The Dhammasaṅgaṇi and Vibhaṅga, particularly, deal with the dhammas on the lines indicated by the Mātikās. The Sanskrit Abhidharma works have not come down to us in their original form. But from the above analysis of the later Abhidharma works like Asm., Aam., Kośa and D*īpa*, it is certain that the original works too had Mātṛikās as their basis. In the old canonical Pali literature the term Mātikā takes place of Abhidharma. It occurs once in the Vinaya-piṭaka and once in the Aṅg. nikāya. An expert in the Mātikās is called Mātikā-dhara. The latter term always occurs with the other two, viz., dhamma-dhara and vinaya-dhara,[2] pointing to the existence of Mātikās as a separate collection of the words of Buddha. The term is known to the Vinaya of the Mūla-Sarvāstivādins[3] and to the Divyāvadāna,[4] where also it is placed side by side with sūtra and vinaya.

The Mātikās are to the Abhidhamma-piṭaka what Pātimokkha rules are to the Vinaya. They are foundations for the super--structures of the Abhidhamma texts (excluding the later Puggalapaññatti and Kathāvatthu) and the Suttavibhaṅga. The laying down of both is considered by the tradition as an exclusive privilege of the Buddha and not of his disciples. Hence follows the claim that even the works built on them are words of the Buddha. The commentators are well aware of the fact that several suttas preached by Ānanda, Moggallāna, Mahākachchāna and Sāriputta are included in the canon as the word of the Buddha.[5] Aṭṭhasālinī quotes the Madhupiṇḍika-sutta of the Majjhima-nikāya to show that although that was preached by Mahākachchāna, he had done so on the basis of the synopsis given by the master and hence it is a Buddha-vachana. The commentators do not pretend that the Kathāvatthu was preached by the Buddha. They attribute it to Tissa-Moggaliputta. But they do claim that the Mātikā of that work was laid down by the Master.[1]

The tradition is that the Buddha preached the Abhidhamma first to his mother during his sojourn for three months in the Tāvatiṁsa heaven. Aṭṭhasālinī, however, wisely adds that he used to leave a "nimmita-Buddha" in heaven and return daily to the human world to fetch his alms. Sāriputta used to approach him then, learn the Abhidhamma from him and preach it to other monks.[2] This story further confirms the part played by Sāriputta in expounding the Abhidhamma. It is stated in the same commentary that "the textual order of the Abhidhamma originated with Sāriputta. The numerical series in the Paṭṭhāna were also determined by him"[3]

These accounts show, in spite of this determination to make the Buddha the sole author of the Abhidhamma-piṭaka, that the commentators agree to a great extent that the books of the Abhidhamma-piṭaka were propounded by the Elders, albeit on the basis of the Master's preachings, and not entirely by the Buddha himself.

A somewhat similar view is shared by the Sarvāsti-vādins, who also possess a separate Abhidharma-piṭaka, consisting of seven 'śāstras'. They too claim that the Abhidharma-piṭaka is preached by the Buddha. Commenting on this claim, Yaśomitra (a Sautrāntika) says, "This is a view of the Ābhidharmikas (not of us who are Sautrāntikas). Indeed, we are told that the Abhidharma-śāstras actually have individual authors, namely :—Ārya Kātyāyanīputra of the Jñānaprasthāna, Sthavira Vasumitra of the Prakaraṇapāda, Sthavira Devaśarman of the Vijñānakāya, ārya Sāriputra of the Dharma-skandha, ārya Maudgalyāyana of the Prajñapti-śāstra, and Mahā-Kaushṭhila of the Saṅgītiparyāya".[4]

Commenting further on the differences between the Sautrāntikas and Vaibhāshikas on the authenticity of the Abhidharma canon, Yaśomitra says: "What is meant by the term Sautrāntika?" "Those who hold the sūtras as authentic and not the śāstras, are called Sautrāntika." "If they do not accept the śāstras as authentic, how do they explain the division of the canon in the three Piṭakas? Is it not a fact that the sūtras know the term 'Abhidharma-piṭaka', as for instance in an expression 'a tripiṭaka monk'?" "That does not matter. For a certain kind of Sūtras themselves, dealing with the determination of meanings and characteristics of dharmas are called Abhidharma."[1]

"In order to dispel a possible confusion arising from this view, the Vaibhāshikas maintain that the Abhidharma-piṭaka, which deals with the nature of the characteristics of elements and belongs to the Upadeśa class, was preached by the Buddha to his disciples, and remains scattered here and there. Just as Dharmatrāta compiled several udānas of the Master (like "Impermanent are indeed the compounded elements") in a work like the Udānavarga, similarly, the Elders Kātyāyanīputra and others collected the Abhidharma together in these śastras".[2]

These comments of Yaśomitra are helpful in understanding the main differences between the Ābhidharmikas and the Sautrāntikas on the authenticity of the Abhidharma. The Sautrāntikas, too, recognise a class of literature grouped under the term Abhidharma-piṭaka, but maintain that it is scattered in the Sūtra-piṭaka itself. The Abhidharma of the Ābhidharmikas, however, consists of a separate collection, claimed as a word of the Buddha. This Abhidharma is, for the Sautrāntikas, a work of śāstrins or āchāryas, and hence not canonical.[3]

The Pali commentators were certainly aware of the late composition of the Abhidharma-piṭaka. This is apparent from their attempt to call it 'abhidhamma-sutta', and their determination to invent alternative introductions (nidānas) for these 'suttas'.[4] In the Sarvāstivāda tradition, however, the Abhidharma-piṭaka is known as śāstra (treatise) clearly showing its distinction from the 'sūtra'. The Sautrāntikas recognised only the Sūtras as canonical and whenever there was conflict between the sūtra and the śāstra, adhered to the Master's advice in the mahāpadeśa preaching.'[1] 'Monks, you ought to take refuge in the Sūtrāntas and not in individuals.' Curiously enough, this line is not found in the Pali version of the Mahāparinirvāṇa-sūtra.

The Sautrāntikas, on account of their adherence to the Sūtrānta in preference to the Abhidharma, claimed not Sāriputra or Mahākāśyapa, but Ānanda as their main preceptor.[2] In the Vinaya-piṭaka we find a group of monks called suttantikas (versed in Suttas), always appearing side by side with vinaya-dharas and dhamma-kathikas.[3] It is possible that they remained devoted to Ānanda, zealously learnt the suttas in their original version, and claimed to preserve the original meanings of them against the 'unauthentic' interpretations by other Elders and heretics.

But the Sautrāntikas (Pali suttantika) as a separate school appear very late in the history of the Buddhist church. Both the Pali and Sanskrit accounts place the Sautrāntika school at the end of the traditional eighteen Nikāyas. Buddhaghosa calls it Suttavāda, a branch of the Saṁkantivāda. The latter branched off from the Kassapikas, a sub-section of the Sarvāstivāda school.

The Sanskrit account given by Vasumitra[4] agrees with the Pali account. Here also the Sautrāntika is a branch of the Sarvāstivāda school and is the last of the eighteen Nikāyas. Vasumitra, however, identifies the Sautrāntika with the saṁkrāntivāda. Bhavya's account[5] makes no mention of the Sautrāntika school, but takes the Saṁkrāntivāda as a branch of the Sarvāstivāda school.

As in the case of several other schools, no work belonging to the Sautrāntikas has come down to us. Therefore, our knowledge of their doctrines is derived solely from other sources. The Kathāvatthu makes no reference to their doctrines. Vasumitra attributes five original doctrines to this school, all dealing with saṁkrānti or santāna,[1] which correspond to the doctrine of bīja (seed) attributed to them in the Bhāshya, Vṛitti and the Sphutārthā of Yaśomitra.

The Sarvadarśana-saṁgraha of Mādhava attributes to them the doctrine of bāhyānumeya-vāda, which revolutionised the theory of perception and foreshadowed the beginnings of Buddhist Logic.

Though the Sautrāntikas existed since the time of the Buddha and survived as an influential school till the later phases of Buddhism, their major activities are to be seen only after the full ascendancy of the Vaibhāshika school. Backing their arguments with the Sūtra preachings, they arose chiefly in revolt against the Realism (dravyavāda) of the Ābhidharmikas and paved the way for the emergency of the Idealistic Mahāyāna schools and particularly that of the Vijñānavādi Buddhism.

What are the particular Ābhidharmika points that the Sautrāntikas thought contrary to the sūtra-preachings of the Buddha? An answer to this question can be found in a close comparison of the Sūtras with the Abhidharma, works of both the Theravāda and Sarvāstivāda schools. Of these, only the Pali Abhidhamma works, together with their commentaries, have come down to us. The entire Abhidharma-piṭaka of the Sarvāstivādins, together with the Mahāvibhāshā, is lost in its original form and is preserved only in the Chinese and Tibetan translations. The few works of this school available to us, therefore, are the later works of Ghoshaka, Vasubandhu and Yaśomitra, and our Dīpa with its Vṛitti.

III

SAUTRĀNTIKA AND ĀBHIDHARMIKA

Both in the Pali and Sanskrit traditions the Abhidharma is grouped under a sub-section called Vyākaraṇa, meaning exposition. But with the growth of the doctrine of bodhisattva, this term came to be used for prophecies or revelations. The Asm. defines the term as a class of literature which contains the prophecies concerning the deaths or births of śrāvakas, or that which explains the import of the Sūtras.[1] In the course of time, the second function of the term vyākaraṇa was transferred to a new aṅga called Upadeśa. Asm. defines it as that which demonstrates the essence of all elements of existence in its true form. It further adds that the Upadeśa class as a whole forms the Abhidharma code of both the Hīnayāna and Mahāyāna.[2] The Abhidharma is defined as that by which the meanings of the Sūtras is best understood.[3] These explanations emphasize the relation of the Abhidharma to the Sūtras. The latter is to be understood through the former, which alone gives the absolute meanings of the dharmas. The Aṭṭhasālinī opens with a statement that the Abhidharma exceeds and is distinguished from the dhamma[4] (i.e. the Suttas). It says that in the Suttanta, the five aggregates (and similarly the twelve āyantanas, eighteen dhātus, Four Truths, twenty-two indriyas, etc.) are classified partially and not fully. In the Abhidhamma they are classified fully by the methods of the Sutta-classification, Abhidhamma classification and catechism.[5] It further states that the Suttas speak of conventional truth with reference to circumstances and with a view of refuting the heretical views, whereas the Abhidhamma deals with reference to states, and aims at the analysis of mind and matter.[6]

A somewhat similar distinction is drawn by the Dīpa. Whenever a discrepancy is found between the Sūtra and the Abhidharma, the Dīpa holds that the statement of the Sūtra is, in some cases ābhiprāyika (explanatory) and in some cases aupachārika (conventional), whereas the Abhidharma statement is lākshaṇika[1] or definitive and hence valid.[2]

This distinction between the Sūtra and Abhidharma is clearly presented in the Vibhaṅgappakaraṇa[3] and vividly explained in its commentary by Buddhaghosa. The Vibhaṅga is the second book of the Abhidhamma-piṭaka. It is devoted to an exhaustive investigation of the dhammas grouped in the style of Abhidharma. It consists of a series of eighteen independent treatises or Vibhaṅgas dealing with topics like khandha, āyatana, dhātu, sachcha, indriya, pachchayākara, etc. Of these, thirteen Vibhaṅgas consist of three parts : the Suttanta-bhājaniya, the Abhidhamma-bhājaniya, and Pañhā-puchchhaka, i.e. a summary of the topic by way of questions and answers with reference to the one hundred and twenty-two headings of the Mātikā list.

The division of the Vibhaṅga into Suttanta-bhājaniya[4] and Abhidhamma-bhājaniya[5] is significant. In the former, the dhammas are presented as they occur in the Suttas. Sometimes a brief commentary is also given here on the Sutta formulas. Thus, for instance, in the Sb. of the Khandha-vibhaṅga,[6] the five skandhas are presented in a manner of the Anattapariyāya-sutta where these are called past, present or future, personal or external, gross or subtle, low or lofty, far or near. These terms are not explained in the Suttas. A question, for instance, may arise regarding the nature of a gross or subtle nāma-khandha, or about the precise meaning of the term atīta. These explanations are given in the Sb. and expanded in the commentary. It is said here that an akusala-vedanā is gross compared to a kusala-vedanā.[1] The latter is subtle compared to the former. Buddhaghosa gives several conflicting views on these explanations.[2] Several controversies on this topic are also preserved in the Bhāshya. The gross and suble rūpa are explained in both schools as sapratigha and apratigha. But in the case of nāma-skandhas, where the concepts of gross or subtle are out of place, the explanations are different. The Vaibhāshikas explain that in the case of nāma-skandhas those which have the five organs as their base are gross; the mind-consciousness and its concomitants are subtle, or alternatively, the kāmāvachara nāma-skandhas are gross compared to the rūpāvachara skandhas, etc.[3] The latter explanation agrees with the Pali Abhidhamma.

[6] For a comparative study of the skandha, āyatana and dhātu classifications in the Theravāda, Sarvāstivāda and Yogāchāra schools, see Manual of Buddhist Philosophy by McGovern, pp. 81-162.

As regards the term atīta and its precise meaning, the Aṭṭhakathā says that this term may refer to past in general (addhāna) or to a particular unit consisting of a series of moments (santati) or to a certain period (samaya) or only to a single moment (khaṇa). The first three meanings are obtained in a conventional preaching, i.e. in the Suttas. In the Abhidhamma, however, only the last explanation is valid as it is a 'paramattha-desanā'.[4]

The Abhidhamma treatment of the same topic, therefore, differs from the simpler and shorter Sutta exposition. Here the five khandhas are in the manner of the Dhammasaṅgaṇi, subjected to a minute analysis of their relations and functions in a momentary existence. They are presented here in several long categories grouped in their ascending numerical order combined with each heading of the 122 Mātikā list.

In the Āyatana-vibhaṅga, the Sb. is very short. The twelve āyatanas are enumerated and described in a single line as impermanent, miserable, non-ego and subject to change.[1] No further details or even definitions of the āyatanas are given, as it is not customary for the Sūtras to furnish them. The Ab. is more exhaustive. Here the twelve āyatanas are defined and presented in full detail. The term dhammāyatana, for instance, is nowhere fully explained in the Suttas. It is a name given to dhammas which are exclusively the objects of mind. They are five: vedanā, chetanā, saññā, saṁkhārā, anidassana-appaṭigha rūpa and asaṁkhatā dhātu (nirvāṇa). Of these the last two items are variously explained in different schools. The Theravādins and the Sautrāntikas do not recognise a kind of matter called avijñapti, but the Vaibhāshikas maintain its existence by referring to the term 'anidarśana-apratigha-rūpa'. The skandha division does not include the nirvāṇa but in the āyatana classification even that non-phenomenal element is included. The Theravādins and the Vaibhāshikas hold it a positive element, whereas the Sautrāntikas, on the authority of several sūtras, maintain that it is only a name for the 'cessation' of passions. Both the Vibhaṅga-Aṭṭhakathā[2] and Bhāshya[3] contain long controversies on this topic. It is quite possible that this was a later development introduced by the Ābhidharmika schools.

The Sb. of the Dhātu-vibhaṅga points to an important phase in the development of the dhātu classification. Three different sets of six dhātus are enumerated here. The first six consist of the elements of solid, liquid, heat, motion, space and consciousness. These are explained here as in the Rāhulovāda-sutta. The second six consist of five kinds of feelings with ignorance as the sixth element. The third six consists of three kinds of wrong thoughts and their three opposites.

It may be noted here that the oft-repeated formula of the eighteen dhātus is not given under the suttanta explanation, despite the fact that it occurs in the Bahudhātuka-sutta. Instead, it is found enumerated in the Ab. Such a discrimination in the treatment of these two sets points to a possibility of a later origin of the Bahudhātuka-sutta. The first set of six dhātus is most certainly the older one. It is repeated several times (even in the Bahudhātuka-sutta) in the Suttas. In the Kośa and the Dīpa[1] they are called maula or basic elements as they constitute a personality. Buddhaghosa is not unaware of the precedence given to these six dhātus over the traditional eighteen. He says that they are virtually included in these six.[2] This, however, appears to be an attempt by the Ābhidharmikas to make their dhātu enumeration conform to the older Sūtra formulas.

In the Ab. the eighteen psycho-physical elements are explained in full detail. The six organs, their corresponding six objects, and the resultant six kinds of consciousness constitute the Ābhidharmika dhātu classification. This is, no doubt, highly useful and scientific. It explains the Buddhist doctrine of perception and serves as a basis for the formation of the doctrine of chitta-vīthi, a unique theory of the Theravāda Aṭṭhakathās. A beginning of this doctrine is suggested in this Dhātu-vibhaṅga.[3]

The Aṭṭhakathā gives several details of the meaning, scope, number and sequence of the dhātus. Different sets of dhātus are spoken of in the suttas. Buddhaghosa collects them all together and tries to show that all these (they number 35) are included in the traditional eighteen. There seems to be no unanimity on the meaning and nature of a few of these dhātus. For instance, the saññā-vedayita-nirodha-dhātu is once described as a non-entity, and again as a kind of kāma or dhamma-dhātu.[4] It may be noted that the former explanation agrees with the Sautrāntikas who also call it a mere notion, a prajñapti-dharma. The Yogāchāras and the Vaibhāshikas, however, enumerate this dhātu as a positive element in their list of the chitta-viprayukta-saṁskāras.[5]

In the Sb. of the Sachcha-vibhaṅga, the Four Noble Truths are given in the same words as in the Mahāsatipaṭṭhāna-sutta. In the Ab. the same topic is presented with a few significant changes. Here the term ariya (noble) is dropped in order to extend the scope of the second Truth, viz., the samudaya.[1] In the Suttas the samudaya is described as taṇhā. In the Abhidhamma all kilesas form the samudaya. In the Suttas the magga-sachcha is described as the Noble Eightfold Path. In the Ab. this Path is described exclusively in association with the lokuttara (supermundane) states of mind and hence only five aṅgas are spoken of. In the Suttas the dukkha-sachcha is always presented first. In the Abhidhamma, however, the samudaya-sachcha is named in the first place.

The theory of Two Truths, viz., the saṁvṛiti and paramārtha which dominates the Idealistic schools of Buddhism, is not referred to in the Pali Abhidhamma-piṭaka. But the Asm. explains it with reference to the Sūtra-description of the duḥkha-satya. In the Sūtras it is described as birth, decay, death, etc., and also as the five upādāna-skandhas. The Asm. says of this that the latter description is according to the paramārtha-satya, the former description is a matter of saṁvṛiti-satya.[2]

It is interesting to note that there is no Sb. in the Indriya-vibhaṅga. This treatise opens with an Ab. Buddhaghosa explains that the twenty-two indriyas do not occur in their traditional order in any Sutta.[3] Certain items of these occur here and there, but their arrangement in the given order is found only in the Abhidhamma. Yaśomitra, however, quotes a Sūtra passage enumerating the twenty-two indriyas in the same order as in the Abhidharma.[4] In view of the above evidence of Buddhaghosa it will not be unfair to treat this particular Vaibhāshika sūtra as of late origin, composed by the Ābhidharmikas to give credence to their enumerations.

The next Vibhaṅga called Pachchayākāra (a treatise on the modes of 'conditionality') deals with the doctrine of paṭichcha-samuppāda (dependent origin). The Sb. is simple. Here the twelve aṅgas of the paṭichcha-samuppāda (avijjā to upāyāsa) are enumerated and explained in the manner of the Nidāna-saṁyutta. The Ab. is, however, repetitive, tedious and complex. Here the twelve aṅgas in their natural (anuloma) and reverse (paṭiloma) order are combined with the formula of the modes of 'conditionality' (pachchyas), and presented, each time with slight but important changes, in relation to their operation through various (kusala, akusala, avyākata, etc.) momentary states of consciousness. It is said in the Aṭṭhakathā that the paṭichcha-samuppāda is preached in the Suttas with reference to a lifetime, whereas in the Abhidhamma it is preached with reference to a single moment.[1] Consequently we find certain significant changes in the abhidharma formula of the paṭichcha-samuppāda. In the Suttas it is 'avijjā pachchayā saṅkhārā' - plural. In the Ab. it is saṅkhāro - singular.[2] Similarly in the Suttas the fifth link is called saḷāyatana (six āyatanas), whereas in the Abhidhamma it is called chhaṭṭhāyatana (sixth āyatana, i.e. the mind).[3] This is because in one single moment there is no possibility of more than one saṅkhāra or one āyatana. In the Suttas the third link is called nāma-rūpa (mind and matter), whereas in the Abhidhamma it is only nāma.[4] It is explained that the Ābhidharmika formula is universal, applicable to all existences. In the arūpa-loka there is no matter and hence the term nāma-rūpa would not apply to it. Similarly, the last five words (soka, parideva, dukkha, domanassa, upāyāsa) of the Sutta formula are dropped out in the Abhidhamma as they are not in operation simultaneously in a single moment.[5]

The Bhāshya also contains similar observations on the paṭichcha-samuppāda. It is said there that this formula can be viewed in four ways. It is applicable to a moment (kshaṇika) or many moments, i.e. three existences (prākarshika). Its links can be viewed only as a relation of the moments of cause and effect (sāṁbandhika) or as different states of the five skandhas (āvasthika).[1]

In the Aṭṭhakathā the meaning of the term avijjā and its place in the whole link is discussed in detail. According to the Sūtras, avijjā is ignorance of the Four Noble Truths, whereas according to the Abhidhamma, it is ignorance of not only the Four Truths but of the past, of the future, of both, and of the law of causality.[2] In short it is ignorance and as such only the absence of knowledge, and hence is described as moha.[3] This view agrees with the Sautrāntikas who also hold it to be only an absence (abhāva)[4] of vidyā or prajñā. The Vaibhāshikas, however, maintain that avidyā is not just an abhāva but a positive element, and cannot be included in any other dharmas.[5] The Bhāshya discusses this point in detail and examines the views of Bhadanta Srīlāta[6] and Dharmatrāta.[7]

The second link, viz., the saṅkhāra (karma formation) is variously described in the Suttas. In some places like the Parivīmaṁsana-sutta,[8] it is described as meritorious, unmeritorious and imperturbable volitions. In the Vibhaṅga-sutta[9] or the Sammādiṭṭhi-sutta[10] it is explained as volitions manifested in bodily, verbal and mental actions. But these two meanings are put together only in the Abhidhamma explanation of the term. Commenting on this Buddhaghosa says: "Well, this Abhidhamma is not of recent composition, nor is it spoken by heretic sages or disciples or gods. It is a word of the Omniscient. The two interpretations are put together to show the identity of the treatment of this topic in the Sutta and Abhidhamma".[1] This explanation reflects the anxiety of the Ābhidharmikas to make their treatment conform to the Sūtra preachings. It also reveals that the Abhidharma not only collects the ḍhammas scattered in the Sūtras, but also compiles several Sūtras on a given topic. This can be illustrated by one more example. In the Ab. in one place the formula of the paṭichcha-samuppāda is presented with only eleven aṅgas by the exclusion of the term saḷāyatana. The Aṭṭhakathā explains that this is done to accommodate the enumerations given in the Mahānidāna-sutta.[2]

The third link viññāṇa is explained in the Sb. as six viññāṇas (chakkhu to mano) as in the Vibhaṅga-sutta.[3] In the Mahānidāna-sutta, however, the viññāṇa is spoken of as descending into the womb of the mother,[4] suggesting that the term referred only to the rebirth consciousness (paṭisandhi chitta), which can only be the last, viz., the manoviññāṇa. In the Abhidhamma, the more comprehensive meaning is accepted so as to embrace all states of consciousness. The Aṭṭhakathā division of the chitta-vīthi (process of consciousness) into pavatti and paṭisandhi is based on the recognition of these two Sutta explanations of the term viññāṇa. The paṭisandhi process explains the moment of rebirth. The pavatti process is solely employed to explain the functions of the consciousness in all other moments.

It is possible that the Sūtra meaning of the term vijñāna (in this formula) was confined only to the moment of rebirth, as the formula was primarily intended to explain the phenomena of rebirth in the absence of an abiding ātman. The other meaning, viz., the six vijñānas, although occurring in the Vibhaṅga-sutta of the Saṁyutta-nikāya, is most probably a later addition introduced by the Ābhidharmikas. This becomes evident from the attempt of the Vaibhāshikas to apply this term not only to the moment of rebirth consciousness, but also to a long preceding period called antarā-bhava (intermediate existence), where alone the six vijñānas could be understood to function.[1]

The sixth link called phassa is described in the Sb. as six kinds of contacts (chakkhu to mano-samphassa) as given in the Vibhaṅga-sutta.[2] In the Ab. it is described in the manner of the Dhammasaṅgaṇi: "Contact which is touching, the being brought into contact......"[3] The term, however, is defined in the Madhupiṇḍika-sutta as the coming together of three (i.e. the organ, the object and the consciousness).[4] Here the phassa is a name given to the mere contact of the trio and not to a separate chetasika dhamma. The Sautrāntikas also quote a similar sūtra[5] and hold sparśa to be mere contact. According to them the sparśa is contact, i.e. coming together of the trio in a causal relationship. In the Abhidharma, however, the sparśa is considered a separate dharma resulting from this contact.[6] The Vaibhāshikas hold this view on the authority of the Shaṭshaṭka-sūtra, where the sparśa is enumerated in addition to the indriya, artha and vijñāna.[7] This sūtra corresponds to the Pali Chhachhakka-sutta. Buddhaghosa too describes phassa as (sensorial or mental) impression resulting from the contact of the trio.[8] The Yogāchāra tradition also holds the sparśa as a distinct dharma. The Asm. defines it as that which determines the changes in the organs on account of the contact of the trio.[9] Thus we see that in all Abhidharma schools the sparśa is treated as a distinct dharma, although the sūtras speak of it as mere 'contact'. Vasubandhu says that certain schools read the sūtra differently as 'saṅgateḥ' instead of 'saṅgatiḥ', which too appears to be an Ābhidharmika modification of the sūtra passage.[1]

The next link is called vedanā (feeling). In the Sb., the vedanā is explained with reference to the six organs through which it is generated (e.g. chakku-samphassajā vedanā, etc.). In the Ab. it is explained with reference to its qualities as pleasant, unpleasant, etc., as they are obtained in the eighty-nine kinds of the consciousness.

In both the Pali and Sanskrit Abhidharma, the sparśa and vedanā are treated as mahābhaumika dharmas. They occur simultaneously in all states of consciousness. In the pratītya-samutpāda formula, however, the vedanā is placed after sparśa, as the latter is the cause of the former. As the cause must precede the effect, the Sautrāntikas hold that on account of their causal relation they cannot operate simultaneously.[2] The Vaibhāshikas, however, hold that the sparśa and vedanā are co-nascent.[3] They quote a sūtra[4] in which these two dharmas are spoken of as being saha-jāta. The Sautrāntikas take the term saha-jāta to mean samanantara.[5] Although the Pali Abhidhamma holds them 'saha-jāta', the Suttas[6] seem to support the Sautrāntika view.

This Vibhaṅga is followed by a series of five Vibhaṅgas dealing with the items of the thirty-seven bodhipakkhiya-dhammas. They are Satipaṭṭhāna-vibhaṅga, Sammappadhāna°, Iddhipāda°, Bojjhaṅga° and Magga-vibhaṅga. Only two groups (indriya and bala) consisting of ten dhammas (viz., saddhā, viriya, sati, samādhi and paññā counted as indriya as well as bala) are not separately treated here as they are already dealt with in the Indriya-vibhaṅga.

The Sb. of these five Vibhaṅgas closely follow the Mahāsatipaṭṭhāna-sutta and read like commentaries on the latter. The satipaṭṭhāna formula, for instance, is directly borrowed without any change. The formula begins as : idha bhikkhu ajjhattam kāye ......etc. The mention of the term bhikkhu in a preaching given to the gods has not escaped the notice of the commentator. Buddhaghosa says : "Although the Lord spoke this in the world of gods and no monk was present there, the term bhikkhu is used to show that only monks practise the four satipaṭṭhānas. A question is naturally asked whether bhikkhus alone could practise them. Buddhaghosa concedes that even gods can practise them. He broadens the meaning of the term bhikkhu and says that whosoever practises them is a bhukkhu, no matter whether a woman or a god".[1] This explanation once more demonstrates the determination of the commentators to prove the authenticity of the Abhidharma and the legends connected with its origin.

The Ab. of these five Vibhaṅgas do not much differ from the suttanta explanations. The same topics are presented here with reference to the supra-mundane (lokuttara) consciousness and in connection with various kinds of samādhis and paṭipadās. Consequently, there are a few changes, for instance, the enumeration of only five aṅgas of the magga instead of the traditional eight. In the Magga-vibhaṅga, the magga is treated in the same manner as in the Sachcha-vibhaṅga. Here also the term ariya is dropped. Such changes appearing in the Abhidhamma must have been repugnant to the followers of Sūtras. Such changes might well have given rise to new doctrines unacceptable even to the Ābhidharmikas. Even the commentator Buddhaghosa appears very uneasy about such changes. In his commentary on the Sachcha-vibhaṅga he explains the Ābhidharmika formula of the pañchaṅgika-magga by quoting a Sūtra passage.[2] But in his commentary on the same formula in the Magga-vibhaṅga he attributes the pañchaṅgika-magga-vāda to a vitaṇḍā-vādin and controverts his view by quoting a different Sutta.[3]

The Paṭisambhidā-vibhaṅga deals with four kinds of faculties of analysis, viz., attha, dhamma, nirutti and paṭibhāna. The derivation of the term paṭisambhidā is doubtful. since in the Skt. tradition it is called pratisaṁvit. There also the same four kinds are enumerated, but the order of the first two is reversed.

Although the Sb. of this Vibhaṅga gives several meanings of the four paṭisambhidās, it should be noted that neither the term nor the four kinds occur in the early Nikāyas. They are found only in the Aṅg. nikāya, and there too they are not explained. The so-called Sb., therefore, is derived from the Paṭisambhidā-magga, an Abhidhamma work (attributed to Sāriputta) included in the Sutta-piṭaka. The Ab. is also drawn from the same source, and hence differs very little from the Sb.

The traditional meanings of these four terms, and particultly those of the first two, viz., the attha° and dhamma° are given in detail by Mrs. Rhys Davids in her translation of the Kathāvatthu,[1] where she also gives views of Dr. Ledi Sadaw on this subject. But the difference between the sūtra and abhidharma meanings of these terms is not clear from this exposition. With the help of the Vaibhāshika interpretations, it is now possible to arrive at a plausible sūtra meaning.

The four paṭisambhidās in all probability stand for four branches of textual analysis. Dhamma meant the navāṅga preachings, i.e. the terms, and attha their verbal meanings. Nirutti meant derivations of the terms or definitions, and paṭibhāna meant a specialised skill in all these in addition to a mastery in the art of composition, preaching and disputation.

In the Sb., however, several meanings are given to the first two, viz., the attha and dhamma. Attha means dukkha, dukkha-nirodha, phala and finally the meanings of any speech, particularly that of the navāṅga preaching.[2] Dhamma means dukkha-samudaya, dukkha-nirodha-gāminī-paṭipadā, hetu and the contents of the navāṅga preaching.[1] In short the attha and dhamma stand for the Four Truths and also for the meanings and contents of the Scriptures. This latter meaning is completely dropped in the Ab. of this topic. Here the first three meanings alone are repeated and demonstrated by applying these terms to the mental concomitants of a given state of consciousness.

[1] Points of Controversy, Appendix, pp. 377-382.

[2] Vbh. pp. 293-4.

While employing the formula of paṭisambhidās to represent the doctrine of Truths, the Ab. completely leaves out the more conventional, and perhaps the original, meaning of the dhamma and attha, viz., the Scriptures and their meanings.

In the Aṅg. nikāya, in one place, Sāriputta claims that he has mastered the four paṭisambhidās even when he was ordained only a fortnight, and that he explains it in various ways.[2] Although the terms attha and dhamma are not explained here, they appear more likely to refer to the expounding of Scriptures than to the doctrine of Four Truths.

This conjecture is strengthened by his demonstration of the paṭisambhidās in the Paṭisambhidā-magga. In a chapter dealing exclusively with this topic,[3] the Dhammachakkappavattana-sutta is fully quoted, followed by an application of the four kinds of paṭisambhidās. A sentence like the following is selected: "idaṁ dukkhaṁ ariya-sachchanti pubbe ananussutesu dhammesu chakkhuṁ udapādi, ñānaṁ......, paññā....., vijjā......āloko udapādi". This is followed by explanations of the terms chakkhu, ñāṇa, etc., e.g., chakkhuṁ udapādīti dassanaṭṭhena. It is then explained that the chakkhu, ñāṇa, paññā, vijjā and āloka are dhammas; they are the objects of the dhamma-paṭisambhidā. The dassanaṭṭha, ñāṇaṭṭha, pajānanaṭṭha, paṭivedhaṭṭha, obhāsaṭṭha—these are aṭṭhas and are objects of the atthapaṭisambhidā. The five dhammas and the five aṭṭhas become the object of nirutti; knowledge of these ten derivations is nirutti-paṭisambhidā. Knowledge of the five dhammas, five aṭṭhas, and ten niruttis make twenty paṭibhāna-paṭisambhidās.

[2] Aṅg. II. p. 160.

[3] Vol. II. pp. 147-158 (Paṭisambhidā-kathā).

The same formula is applied to pariññeya and pariññāta formulas of the dukkha-sachcha. This gives fifteen dhammas (terms), fifteen atthas, thirty niruttis and sixty paṭibhānas. A similar number is obtained in the case of the remaining three Truths. Thus, according to these calculations, the discourse on the Four Truths in their ti-parivaṭṭa-dvādasākāra formula has 60 dhammas, 60 atthas, 120 niruttis and 240 paṭibhānas.[1] Similar calculations are given for the formulas of satipaṭṭhāna, sammappadhāna, etc. bringing the total of dhammas (terms) treated in the Paṭisambhidā-kathā to a number of 850.[2] It is clear from this illustration that according to the Paṭisambhidā-magga, the dhamma in the paṭisambhidā formula stands for 'terms' and attha for 'meanings'.

Such a collection of dharmas (or terms) might well have received the designation 'dharma-skandha' or aggregates of dharmas. The Pali tradition speaks of 84,000 dhammakkhandhas learnt by Ănanda. It is said that of these he learnt 2,000 from Sāriputta, and the rest from the Buddha himself. The Aṭṭhasālinī exlpains that a sutta containing one theme constitutes a dhamma-khandha. In verses each query asked forms a skandha, and each answer forms another. In the Abhidhamma each duka or tika classification as well as each classification of states of consciousness, forms a dhamma-khandha. In the Vinaya the subjects, tables of contents, classification of terms etc. are considered as separate dhamma-khandhas.

The Vaibhāshikas speak of 80,000 dharma-skandhas. But there is no unanimity on what constitutes a dharma-skandha. Some hold that the term refers to an Abhidharma text called by that name. But this is said to contain only 6,000. Some hold that the term refers to discourses on such topics as skandha, āyatana, dhātu, pratītya-samutpāda etc. The Dīpakāra holds that there are 80,000 kinds of people for whom the Buddha preaches dharma suitable to each one of them.[3]

[1] Ibid. p. 152.

[2] Ibid. p. 158.

[3] Adv. p. 11, notes.

All these explanations tend to give an impression that the original meaning of this term might have been something like a unit of a text commented upon, which comes very near to the 'dhamma' in the formula of the paṭisambhidā.

This is supported by the evidence of the Vaibhāshika and Yogāchāra interpretations of these terms. In both schools the dharma precedes the artha-pratisaṁvit. Yaśomitra is aware of the several meanings of the term dharma but specifically states that in the present context it means the Scriptures.[1] The Vṛitti explains it as the contents of the dvādaśāṅga-pravachana[2] corresponding to the navaṅga-satthu-sāsana. The Asm. too explains the term as sarva-dharma-paryāya.[3] The artha in all these schools means the meaning or purport of the Scriptures.

The Vaibhāshika and the Yogāchāra schools thus take the dharma and artha exclusively in the sense of the knowledge of Scriptures and their meanings. This, therefore, appears to be the original or the sūtra meaning of these terms. The other meanings such as hetu and phala are found only in the Pali Abhidhamma.

The paṭisambhidā have little connection with the supermundane path. They are not attained by any traditional dhāyanas[4] but by the study of Scriptures and sciences useful in textual exegesis. It is a method adopted by the Abhidharma-piṭaka and the Aṭṭhakathās to explain the Suttas. Texts like Dhammasaṅgaṇi, Vibhaṅga, their Aṭṭhakathās, Milinda-pañha, Visuddhimagga, the Asm. Bhāshya and Vṛitti reveal an intensive and sustained application of their authors towards collecting the dharmas (terms) and explaining them by giving their derivations.

This method of textual analysis helped the commentators to attempt a concordance of diverse Sūtras spoken in different contexts and thus to present a consistent and coherent interpretation of the Scriptures. This is called abhisaṁdhi. The Asm. repeatedly quotes conflicting Sūtras and tries to reconcile their meanings.[1] This proficiency in discovering the hidden meanings and giving a correct interpretation of the Sūtras is held to result from a proper knowledge of the Abhidharma.[2]

[4] Vm. XIV. 31.

In doing this, the commentators are guided by the consideration of the Doctrine. We have seen how the Abhidharma is claimed to be an absolute preaching in opposition to the conventional preaching of the Sūtras. The same test is applied in judging the value of two or more conflicting Sūtras. Already in the Aṅg. nikāya, we find a distinction drawn between neyattha (neyārtha) and nītattha (nītārtha) suttas.[3] The entire Kathāvatthu may be taken as a demonstration of the application of this test to the Sūtras put forward by the opponents. The first Puggala-kathā, for instance, is devoted to showing the 'nītārtha' of the Sūtra term puggala to the Sammitīya.

The foregoing study of the Vibhaṅgappakaraṇa amply justifies the claim that the Sūtras are to be understood through the Abhidharma. It also reveals the Ābhidharmika approach to Sūtras and the Abhidharma : the Sūtras are conventional, partial, explanatory, and at times of secondary import. The Abhidharma is absolute, comprehensive, definitive and of primary import. The subject matter of both is the same viz., the dharmas called variously as skandha, āyatana, dhātu, etc. but the Sūtras deal with these as components of a personality, i.e. with reference to a lifetime, whereas the Abhidharma deals with them as unique dharmas of momentary existence. The pivotal doctrine of Buddhism, viz., anātmavāda, although it pervades the whole range of Sūtras, is deepened, emphasized and fully demonstrated only in the Abhidharma. But this could hardly have led even the early Sautrāntikas to oppose the Abhidharma, for they too were, unlike the Sammitīyas, equally committed to this doctrine.

[2] Ibid. p. 83.

[3] Aṅg. I. p. 60.

Their main contention must have been against the manner in which their opponents sought to establish it. The Ābhidharmikas not only claimed authenticity for their own Abhidharma works but also superiority over the Sūtras—the words of the Buddha, and consequently over the Sautrāntikas.[1] They claimed for their works the exclusive title of 'paramārtha-deśanā', relegating the Sūtras to the realm of vyavahāra. They accepted the Sūtra formulas of the dharmas but presented them with significant changes, as for instance the pañchaṅgika-magga, the ekādasaṅgika-paṭichcha-samuppāda or the pañchaka-jhāna. In the interpretation of formulas they made additions of dharmas which were most probably not warranted by the Sūtras. For instance, the inclusion of the asaṁkhatā-dhātu in the nāma-khandha and in the dhammāyatana. They extended the scope of terms, as for instance of the viññāṇa or sparśa in the paṭichcha-samuppāda formula, or of the dhamma and attha in the formula of paṭisambhidhās. They invented new dharmas as, for instance the hadaya-vatthu or such kinds of the rūpa-skandha as lahutā, mudutā etc., not treated in the Suttas. The Suttas speak of only six kinds of viññāṇas. The 89 classes of viññāṇas (as illustrated in the Dhammasaṅgaṇi) are found only in the Abhidhamma. The Suttas describe the sankhāra-khandha as six kinds of chetanā, but the Abhidhamma enumerates fifty dhammas under the term saṅkhāra, The classification of these sankhāras into sabba-chitta-sādhāraṇa and such other groups is also found only in the Abhidharma, and especially in the commentaries. The theory of chitta-vīthi suggested in the Vibhaṅga was also fully developed only in the Aṭṭhakathās. These new formulas, novel interpretations and later additions introduced by the Ābhidharmikas might have been unwelcome to the early Sautrāntikas, the contemporaries of the Pali Abhidhamma.

This is proved by their sustained opposition to the inflated list of categories formulated by the Vaibhāshika school. The Theravādins had included only the chaitasika dharmas in the saṁskāra skandha, but the Vaibhāshikas added thirteen new dharmas called chitta-viprayukta-saṁskāra. Indeed, a majority of the controversies raised in the Bhāshya and the Vṛitti deal with these saṁskāras which the Sautrāntikas treated as mere notions (prajñaptimātra). They reduced the 46 saṁskāras of the Vaibhāshika to a number of twenty,[1] consisting of ten kuśala and ten akuśala chetanās, more agreeing with the Sūtra meaning of the saṁskāra-skandha. Even the Ăbhidharmika division of the saṁskāras as mahā-bhaumika etc. was not recognised by them. They discarded this grouping when it went against the Sūtras as is shown by their insistence on treating the sparśa and vedanā (two mahā-bhaumika dharmas) as cause and effect, and hence not operating simultaneously in one moment.

In the Theravāda Abhidharma nirvāṇa alone is called asaṁskṛita-dharma. The Vaibhāshikas enumerated one more, viz., ākāśa. They also maintained the reality of past and future dharmas. The Sautrāntika, on the basis of a sūtra,[2] rejected all these as prajñaptimātra and relegated them to the position of the pudgala. By his bold advocacy of the theory of prajñapti and its extension to a majority of reals (dravya) including the asaṁskṛita dharmas of the Ăbhidharmika, the Sautrāntika not only asserted his critical spirit but also established the superiority of the Sūtras over the Abhidharma. From this theory flowed his doctrine of vikalpa (conceptual construction), his theory of perception and lastly the revolutionary theory of bāhyānumeyavāda, which was but one step towards the more critical subjective idealism of the Vijñānavāda Buddhism.

SOME MAJOR CONTROVERSIES BETWEEN THE KOŚAKĀRA AND THE DĪPAKĀRA

This struggle, stretching through several centuries of the history of Buddhism, between the Sautrāntika and the Ābhidharmika reaches its culmination in the Kośa-Bhāshya and the Dīpa-Vṛitti. The Dhammasaṅgaṇi, Vibhaṅga and their Aṭṭhakathās reveal only the beginnings of these differences. It is not possible to say to what extent the seven Abhidharma Śāstras of the Sarvāstivāda school opposed the Sautrāntika doctrines. Their compilation perhaps led to the emergence of the Sautrāntika as a distinct school. But it is certain that the Mahā-Vibhāshā the encyclopaedic Commentary on the Jñāna-prasthāna which gave rise to the Vaibhāshika school, contained opinions of several contemporary Sautrāntika āchāryas, notably of Kumāralāta, Srīlāta, Dharmatrāta and "Bhadanta".[1]

The name Sautrāntika, however, occurs only once in the Mahā-Vibhāsha.[2] Instead, we find scores of references to Dārshṭāntikas, whom Yaśomitra describes as a section of the Sautrāntika school.[3] Kumāralāta is generally held to be the founder of this school. It is suggested that his followers were called dārshṭāntika after his Dṛishṭānta-pankti.[4] J. Przyluski connects the word dṛishṭānta to dṛishṭi (Pali diṭṭhi) in opposition to sūtra (Śruti) and maintains that the word Dārshṭāntika was applied to the Sautrāntika by the Vaibhāshikas, as did the Mahāyānists use the deprecatory term Hīnayāna to their opponents.[5] In the Vṛitti too they are called 'sthiti-bhāgīya' and further abused as a kind of Śākyas having a dog's tail.[1] The term sthiti-bhāgīya perhaps alludes to the Sautrāntika theory of saṁkrānti, santāna or bīja, severely criticised in the Vṛitti and also in the works of the Vaibhāshika āchārya Saṁghabhadra.

Although these two words, viz., the Dārshṭāntika and Sautrāntika are used separately in the Bhāshya, in the Vṛitti they are almost used as synonyms. Several Sautrāntika views appearing in the Bhāshya are attributed to the Dārshṭāntika in the Vṛitti.[2] It is, therefore, to be presumed that at the time of the Vṛitti these two names were treated as almost identical, referring to one and the same school.

Although the Sautrāntikas or the Dārshṭāntikas like Kumāralāta and Śrīlāta played a major role in the period of the Mahāvibhāshā, their activities appear to be directed only towards evolving their doctrines side by side with the Vaibhāshikas, or towards submitting alternative interpretations of the sūtras quoted by the Ābhidharmikas, as is evident from the Sphutārthā of Yaśomitra. They are not yet hostile to the Vaibhāshika; the Vṛitti quotes Kumāralāta as an authority[3] and seeks to support even the doctrine of three times (adhva-traya) by his drishṭānta of the motes in the sunlight.[4]

The Sautrāntikas found their chief exponents in the persons of Vasubandhu the author of the celebrated Abhidharma-Kośa-Bhāshya, and his competent commentator Yaśomitra, the author of the Sphuṭārthā Abhidharma-Kośa-Vyākhyā. Vasubandhu stands in a supreme position among the later Buddhist teachers. A Sautrāntika by conviction he wrote a compendium on the Abhidharma and finally emerged as a great exponent of the Vijñānavāda Buddhism.

Although he claimed that the Kośa was composed in conformity with the Kāśmīra-Vaibhāshika school,[5] his Bhāshya reveals that his real affiliation was with the Sautrāntika. He often uses the adverb 'kila' to show his disagreement with the Vaibhāshika view.[1] On almost all controversial points between the two, he openly favours the Sautrāntika viewpoint.[2] In his characteristically powerful style, Vasubandhu critically examined the dravya-vāda of the Vaibhāshikas, accused them of being literalists,[3] ridiculed their dogmatism,[4] and compared them with such heretical schools as the Sāṁkhya and Vaiśeshika.[5] Yaśomitra rightly observes that Vasubandhu belongs to the Sautrāntika school.[6]

The Sautrāntika leanings of Vasubandhu, professedly in a work dealing with Abhidharma, brought hostile reactions from his contemporary orthodox Vaibhāshikas. Paramārtha, in his 'Life of Vasubandhu'[7] relates that Saṁghabhadra, an eminent orthodox Vaibhāshika composed two works in refutation of the Bhāshya. In the first work entitled "Conformity of the Truth" ("Nyāyānusāra"),[8] he refuted the Bhāshya in favour of the Vibhāshā. Yaśomitra in his Sphuṭārthā quotes several long passages from this work[9] and at times refutes them in favour of the Bhāshya. This work is not referred to in the Vṛitti. But as will be seen from the comparisons given in the footnotes to our Text,[10] the Vṛitti is in agreement with the views of Saṁghabhadra, particularly on such topics as vitarka-vichāra, prāpti, bīja, kāritra, etc. The other work called "Samaya-pradīpikā" is an abridged version of the "Nyāyānusāra".[11] Although written in refutation of the Bhāshya, these two works of Saṁghabhadra are, in a sense, commentaries on the Kośa. The Kārikas of the Kośa were taken as a basis, except for a few minor changes in a few places, for explaining the orthodox Vaibhāshika viewpoint.[1]

These two works of Saṁghabhadra afford a striking parallel to our Dīpa (and its Vṛitti). All the three works belong to the Kāśmīra-Vaibhāshika school. They are hostile to the Kośakāra, and are primarily written to refute the Sautrāntika views upheld in the Bhāshya. In their contents and their presentation they take the Kośa as their model and retain those parts of the Bhāshya which are not objectionable to them. They hold identical views on almost all controversial points. Their main difference, however, lies in the fact that the works of Saṁghabhadra are based on the kārikās of the Kośa, whereas the Dīpa has its own kārikās, notwithstanding their correspondence to the Kośa.

Neither the "Nyāyānusāra" (except for the extracts quoted in the Sakv.), nor the "Samaya-pradīpikā" have come down to us in their original form. They are available only in Chinese translations. Nor are we aware of any other work written against the Kośakāra. The Dīpa, therefore, notwithstanding its fragmentary character, has a unique value in furnishing us with the orthodox Vaibhāshika reactions to the Bhāshya.

The extant Vṛitti contains the following sixteen hostile references to the Kośakāra :—

Of these Nos. 3 and 4 refer to omissions of certain topics by the Kośakāra in his Bhāshya. Nos. 2 and 5 deal with certain aspects of the Sautrāntika theory of perception. No. 6 deals with the Kośakāra's definition of paramāṇu. No. 7 refers to a controversy about the co-operation of vitarka and vichāra in a single moment of consciousness. Nos. 8, 9 and 10 deal with certain items of the much debated Vaibhāshika categories called chitta-viprayukata-saṁskāra. Nos. 11 and 12 deal with certain aspects of karma. Nos. 13 and 14 have a bearing on the Sautrāntika theory of bīja. The last two references, Nos. 15 and 16 deal with the fundamental Vaibhāshika doctrine of the reality of three Times, i.e. the sarvāstivāda. In the following pages we propose to deal in brief with a few of the major controversies in the light of the Bhāshya and the Vṛitti.

1. Theory of Cognition :

While dealing with a topic 'kati dṛishṭiḥ, kati na dṛishṭiḥ?', the Dīpa says that there are eight kinds of dṛishṭis. viz., the five wrong views and three right views.[1] In addition to these the organ of eye is also called dṛishṭi on account of its function of seeing its object.[2] A question then is raised whether vijñāna should also not be included under this term. The Vṛitti points out that the function of apprehension (darśana) cannot be primarily attributed to vijñāna. Four things can be said to perform the function of seeing. The eye or the eye-consciousness, or the prajña (one of the eight dṛishṭis accompanying all states of consciousness), or finally the totality of all these and such other causes as the light, etc.[1]

---

[1] Adv. p. 29, n. 4.

[2] Ibid.

Of these, the eye alone, independent of the vijñāna, cannot be said to apprehend, for at the same time other organs also will similarly be doing their actions (hearing, smelling, etc.) and this will result in a simultaneous activity of all sense organs in a single moment. The eye-consciousness alone cannot be said to 'apprehend', for being independent of the eye, it may 'see' even things screened from view. Furthermore, if the vijñāna 'sees' (paśyati) the object, who else does the function of knowing (vijānāti) it? The prajñā too cannot see, as it is a mental concomitant common to all states of consciousness. The last, viz., the totality of causes is only a notion, since it is not different from the factors of perception examined above.[2]

After showing the invalidity of these four views, the Dīpakāra sets forth the Kāśmīra-Vaibhāshika theory: "The eye apprehends and the consciousness knows (its object). There is a great difference between these two on account of their different functions, viz., the apprehension and comprehension.[3]

"The substance called eye is of the nature of that which sees (a 'seer'). In it is produced an action of seeing when its power is awakened on account of the emergence of the totality of its causes and conditions. The eye does not apprehend independent of the vijñāna, nor does the eye-consciousness know the object unsupported by the active eye. The eye, as well as the eye-consciousness, with the help of such accessories as the light, etc. co-operate simultaneously towards bringing the perception of a given object. All these things happen in a single moment. The object, the eye, the eye-consciousness and the light, all manifest their power, i.e. become active and flash forth simultaneously. The object appears, the eye sees and the eye-consciousness knows it. This is called the direct knowledge of an object."[1]

---

[1] These are the views held by different schools. See LVPAk., Vol. I, p. 82. Vide Adv. p. 32, n. 1.

[2] Adv. p. 31.

[3] Ad. Kā. 44.

Therefore, although there are several conditions, still, since the condition of eye is prominent, it is said that the eye sees. The prominence of the eye is evident, since the clearer the eye-sight, the clearer the perception. It is, therefore, well said "(In fact) the eye sees, but we use such (metaphorical) expressions: 'the consciousness sees."[2]

The Kośakāra in his Bhāshya examines this Vaibhāshika theory. He points out that, in this particular context, there is no real difference between 'seeing' and 'knowing', although we have such usages as the eye 'sees' or the mind 'knows'. The Vaibhāshika seeks to support his point by referring to a sūtra: 'chakshushā rūpāṇi dṛishṭvā'.[3] The Kośakāra maintains that this should not be taken literally. We do use such expressions as 'the cots cry', when in fact we mean the children (in the cots) cry. Similarly, the organ of eye is a seat or a door (dvāra) through which the consciousness 'sees' an object, although we say the eye 'sees'.

But even the expression 'consciousness knows' is not to be taken literally, since there is no consciousness apart from knowing. The knowledge does not grasp, the eye does not see, the object does not offer itself to both. All dharmas being momentary are incapable of any activity; what we call action is nothing more than their coming into existence in a sequence determined by the law of pratītya-samutpāda. There is neither an actor, nor an action apart from the mere flash of dharmas.[4]

---

[1] Adv. p. 32.

[2] Ibid., p. 33.

[3] This controversy is recorded in the Kathāvatthu, where the Mahāsāṅghika too quotes this sūtra. The Theravādin's interpretation is identical with that of the Kośakāra. Buddhaghosa in his Vm. clearly states that it is chakkhuviññāṇa which 'sees' the rūpa and not the chakkhu. See Adv. p. 33, n. 1.

[4] See Buddhist Doctrine of Flux, pp. 71ff.

After showing the real meaning of the sūtra, the Kośakāra turns his polemic against the 'dravyavāda' of the Vaibhāshika. The use of such words as dravya, kartṛi, śakti and kriyā by the latter echoed the views of the heretical Puggalavādin, who also maintained the reality of an 'actor' doing an action. The Vaibhāshika, however, uses these terms to show the reality of his 'dravya' in the three Times. The Kośakāra points out that this 'kartṛi-kriyā-bheda' is repugnant to the spirit of Buddhism and puts the following words in the mouth of the Sautrāntika: "What is this chewing of the empty space' A visual consciousness arises conditioned by the organ of vision and the object. Here who sees and who is seen? There is nothing else but the elementary factors appearing as cause and effect. In usage, however, such expressions are employed—'the eye sees' or 'consciousness knows'. One should not attach any importance to such expressions. Indeed the Buddha has declared, "Do not stick to the expressions used by common people, do not run after the worldly terms". The Kāśmīra Vaibhāshikas, however, hold that "the eye sees, the ear hears, the nose smells, the tongue tastes, the body feels and the intellect knows".[1]

The Dīpakāra notes these provoking words of the Kośakāra (identified with the Sautrāntika) which repudiated the Sarvāstivādin's theory of kāritra (vyāpāra=activity of a dravya) and condemned the Vaibhāshika as a literalist. He brings an accusation against the Kośakāra of not only showing his ignorance of the Abhidharma but also of heading for the precipice of ayoga-śūnyatā.[2] The term ayoga-śūnyatā, as will be discussed below, refers to a Mahāyāna doctrine attributed by the Vṛitti to a Vaināśika school[3] which repudiated the reality of not only the past and future but also of the present.

This Vaibhāshika theory, i.e. 'the eye sees' etc. is again alluded to in the Vṛitti in a discussion on the ādhipatya of the indriyas. The Dīpakāra holds that the five sense organs have supremacy over the action of illuminating their own objects, as for instance, the eye 'perceives' a path as even or uneven.[1] The Vṛitti also quotes a view of the Elder āchāryas[2] who consider that the five organs have domination over the following four actions: (1) in making the body beautiful, (2) in withdrawing the body from undesirable objects, (3) in the production of their corresponding vijñānas, (4) and in being a special cause of such actions as darśana, śravaṇa, etc.

The Kośakāra also quotes this view of the Elder āchāryas and criticises it from the Sautrāntika viewpoint.[3] The latter maintains that the withdrawing of the body is a function of the vijñāna and not of the organs. As regards the actions like darśana or śravaṇa, they are identical with vijñāna. It is therefore, wrong to attribute these functions to the sense organs. The ādhipatya of the sense organs (says the Sautrāntika) consists only in perceiving (upalabdhi) their respective objects.[4]

It may be noted that this view of the Sautrāntika (i.e. the Kośakāra) is not different from the view of the Vaibāshika Dīpakāra. The former describes it as Svārthopalabdhi, the latter calls it svārtha-vyakti. This identity gives a further occasion for a criticism of the Kośakāra. The Dīpa accuses him of claiming to be a 'paṇḍita'. The Vṛitti comments that this view of the Kośakāra is borrowed from the Vaibhāshika. Nothing new is said; the Vaibhāshikas themselves have held this view.[5]

The causal relation between the object and the consciousness forms one of the most intricate problems that confront the Buddhist theory of perception. The Buddhist is committed to a doctrine of radical momentariness of all things, both mind and matter. According to him all dharmas are particular, unique and momentary. A perception involves the participation of at least three things, viz., an object, an organ of sense and a consciousness. It is said in the sūtras that a visual perception arises, conditioned by an organ of vision and its object — a rūpa. Since all these are momentary, it is difficult to establish a relation between them. Causality demands a temporal sequence. A cause must precede the effect.

[1] Adv. p. 45.

[2] Ibid. p. 46.

[3] See LVPAk. II. p. 103. Vide Adv. p. 47.

The object according to the Buddhist is a cause (ālambana-pratyaya) of its knowledge. Being a cause it must be antecedent to its cognition. The two cannot arise simultaneously and yet stand as cause and effect. But being momentary the object ceases before its cognition can be produced. A perception of a momentary object is therefore an impossibility.[1]

This is well summed up in the following objection raised by the Dārshṭāntika: "The organs and the objects of the five sense-consciousness, being causes of the latter, belong to a past moment. When the object (rūpa) and the eye exist, the visual consciousness is non-existing. When the visual consciousness exists, the eye and the object (rūpa) are not existing. In the absence of their duration in the moment of the (visual) consciousness there is no possibility of the cognition of the object". "Therefore," concludes the Dārshṭāntika, "all (sense) perceptions are indirect".[2]

The object must precede and endure if it is to be available to its cognition. But this goes against the doctrine of momentariness. The Theravādin gets rid of this difficulty by partially abandoning the theory of momentariness. According to him a 'mind moment' (chittakkhaṇa) consists of three ultimate moments, viz., the moments of origin, duration, and death.[3] The whole process of cognition (chitta-vīthi) takes seventeen such chittakkhaṇas. The number seventeen would appear arbitrary, but according to the Theravādin it corresponds to the life of a material object. One object-moment (rupakkhaṇa) is equivalent to seventeen 'mind-moments'.[1] The matter is born in the first moment, endures for fifteen moments and perishes in the seventeenth moment. It cannot become an object in its first (i.e. origin) moment, but can become one from its second moment onwards.[2] This theory apparently makes the object precede as well as endure a whole process of its cognition. This is indeed a very ingenious explanation. Both the object and the cognition are called khaṇika (momentary) but the speed of the perishing of the object is slowed down 17 times. Here we have a theory of two kinds of moments, put forth for the sake of convenience, regardless of the fundamental Buddhist hypothesis of universal impermanence.

[3] uppāda-ṭṭhiti-bhaṅga-vasena khaṇa-ttayaṁ eka-chitta-kkhaṇaṁ nāma.— A. Saṅgaho, IV, 8.

This theory of the Theravādins is shared by the Sammitīya. The latter also maintains that the mind and mental concomitants are momentary but that matter endures for a longer time.[3]

The Kathāvatthu records a controversy on this assumption of two kinds of impermanence. The Pubba-seliyas and the Apara-seliyas hold that since all conditioned things are impermanent they must endure but one chitta moment. Having accepted the law of universal impermanence it is illogical to hold that one thing ceases quickly and other after an interval.[4] The Thervādin points out that if it were not so, the organ of eye and the (resultant) visual consciousness would be saha-jāta[5] (born together). This would be contrary to the Scriptures where it is said: "If the organ of sight within be intact, the object without comes into focus, and there be a co-ordinated application of mind resulting therefrom, then a corresponding state of cognition is manifested".[6]

In his attempt to make the cause precede the result, the Theravādin abandons the theory of universal momentariness. The Vaibhāshika takes an opposite course. He adheres to the doctrine of universal momentariness but admits the co-existence (saha-bhāva) of the object and its cognition by discarding a temporal sequence between the two. He maintains that there is a peculiar relation called sahabhū-hetu between the object, organ and the cognition. All these rise simultaneously and yet operate as cause and effect like the lamp and its light or the sprout and its shadow. The objection that a causal relation demands temporal sequence does not frighten the Vaibhāshika. According to him a causal relation consists in the invariable concomitance of two things. Since there is this relation between the object (and organ) and its cognition, these are related as cause and effect.[1]

But if the object, organ and the consciousness operate simultaneously, it is difficult to see why the knowledge is determined by the object and not by the eye. It may determine its character even without the object. The Vaibhāshika here takes recourse to a theory of 'co-ordination', called sārūpya. According to this theory "there is between two of them—consciousness and object a special relation called sārūpya, a relation which makes it possible that the complex phenomenon—the resulting cognition —is a cognition of colour and not of the visual sense".[2]

The Sautrāntika accepts the relation of sārūpya ('co-ordination') between the subject and object, but criticises the sabhāga-hetu or the simultaneity of the cause and effect. He examines the examples of lamp and light and points out that the lamp is not the cause of light. Both are results of a separate cause belonging to a past moment.[3] The problem of perception thus remains unsolved on account of the uncompromising nature of the doctrine of momentariness and the theory of causation.

[3] See Sakv. p. 197.

The Sautrāntika theory of perception is not explained in the Dīpa or in the Kośa. But we can gather it from later works like the Nyāyabindu of Dharmakīrti, its Ṭīkā by Dharmottara, the Tattva-saṅgraha of Śāntarakshita, the Pañjikā on it by Kamalaśīla, and finally from the Sarva-darśana-saṁgraha of Mādhava.

The Sautrāntika is called a sākāra-jñāna-vādin. According to him the subject is, like a mirror, capable of receiving an impress of the likeness of its object. What is directly known in the cognition (which is 'self-revealing', sva-saṁvedaka) is this representation of the object and not the object itself. The object is only inferred to be existing as it corresponds to the impression perceived. This theory is known as bahyārthānumeyavāda, the theory of the inferability of the external object.

This is well explained in the Sarva-darśana-saṁgraha. In his reply to an objection of the pūrva-paksha (Vijñānavādin) that a past object cannot be grasped by knowledge, the Sautrāntika says that the object which has come into contact with an organ has a power of leaving its image on the following resultant knowledge, whereby the object is inferred. This peculiar efficiency of the sense-object determines the causal relation between the object and its cognition. The external object is only inferred, as for instance, good feeding is inferred from a well-nourished appearance or affection is inferred from flurried movements.[1]

The Sautrāntika by his theory of sākāra-jñāna-vāda ('representative perception') paved the way for the emergence of the idealist Vijñānavāda. The external object was pushed into the background by maintaining that what was directly perceived was the content of knowledge and not the object. "The object being always inferred, the content alone became real to the knowledge".[2] The Vijñānavādin goes a step further and maintains that the objects are mere ideal projections, ideas alone are real.

The Dīpakāra does not enter into a full criticism of this Sautrāntika theory of perception. He only points out that in the absence of a direct perception (pratyaksha) of the external objects, even the other two means of proper knowledge—the anumāna (inference) and the Scriptures (āgama) are not possible, as the latter are dependent on the direct perception.[1]

2. Vitarka and Vichāra.

We have seen above a predominant tendency of the Abhidharma-piṭaka towards a minute analysis of the mind and mental concomitants (chaitta). The latter consists of three skandhas, viz., vedanā, sañjnā, and saṁskāra. Of these the last is more complex as it covers a vast field of several constituents of consciousness recognised as ultimate real elements by all Ābhidharmika schools. A major part of the Dhammasaṅgaṇi is devoted to an enumeration of saṁskāras that associate with each of the 89 kinds of consciousness. The first kāmāvachara-kusala-chitta, for instance, is said to be accompanied by not less than 54 regular and nine supplementary (yevāpanaka) saṁskāras. A large number of factors in such lists are synonyms. The commentators are not unaware of the overlapping character of these factors. The Aṭṭhasālinī puts into the mouth of a critic the comment : "It is a disconnected exposition, disorderly like booty carried away by thieves.........it is done without an understanding of the matter."[2] Although the Aṭṭhasālinī tries to justify this inflated list,[3] the neo-Theravādins like Buddhaghosa and Anuruddha brought the number of real saṁskāras to fifty by removing the repetitions and attributing several functions to a large number of factors. The groupings of these saṁskāras as universal and particular etc., are also found only in the later works like the Abhidhammatthasaṅgaho. This division of saṁskāras in such groups[4] not only necessitated detailed definitions of them but also an explanation of their relation to each other. The Aṭṭhasālinī and the Visuddhimagga offer good definitions of these dharmas but are rather laconic in dealing with their mutual relation. The latter task is more seriously taken up during the time of the Mahā-vibhāshā, and is carried further by the Kośakāra in his Bhāshya, as can be seen from the following discussion on the vitarka and vichāra.

[3] For a critical study of the classification of these factors, see Abhidharmma Studies by Bhikkhu Nyāṇapoṇika.

[4] For a comparative study of these divisions in the Theravāda, Sarvāstivāda and Yogāchāra schools, see McGovern's Manual of Buddhist Philosophy, Vol. I. pp. 137-162.

In the Pali suttas the term vitakka is often used to denote a certain preoccupation of mind, a particular kind of thought, as for instance, kāma-vitakka, vyāpāda-vitakka, vihiṁsā-vitakka (sensual, malign and cruel thought) and their opposites: nekkhama, avyāpāda, and avihiṁsā vitakka. In this particular sense the vitakka is a synonym of michchhā-saṅkappa ('wrong thoughts or intentions') and sammā-saṅkappa (right thoughts or intentions). In the formulas of jhāna, the vitakka is often combined with vichāra, where they mean respectively the initial and the sustained application of mind on the object. They are also said to provoke speech[1] suggesting thereby that every speech is preceded by a certain examination and judgment. In Aṭṭhasālinī these two terms are explained at great length.[2] The vitakka is described as ūhana ('prescinding' of mind). It lifts the consciousness onto the object. By it the mind strikes at (āhanana) and around the object. Vichāra is the discursive work of the mind upon or traversing (anusañcharaṇa) of the object. Threshing out (or contemplation—anumajjana) of the object is its characteristic. In the Milindapañha, vitakka is called appanā ('application'). It is again called ākoṭana ('knocking') and compared with the initial stroke on a drum. The vichāra is compared to the after reverberation and continuous omission of sound.[3] The commentators explain these two factors by the help of various similes. The vitakka is compared to the striking of a bell, the vichāra is compared to the consequent reverberation. The vitakka is again compared to the flapping of the wings of a bird about to fly up in the air, and the vichāra is compared to the planing movement of the wings of that bird in the sky. Or again the vitakka is like the thorn fixed in the middle in making a circle and vichāra is like the revolving thorn outside.[1]

---

[1] Vide Adv. p. 83, n.1.

[2] See Dhs A. III. 198-201.

[3] Milinda, p. 65.

From these explanations it is evident that the vitarka is an initial application of mind on the object and the vichāra is a subsequent sustained application. The former is said to possess 'vibration' (vipphāravā) or a mental thrill and therefore called oḷārika (gross). The latter is of a calmer nature and hence called sūkshma.

Thus these two dharmas partake of two opposite characteristics, viz., audārika and sūkshma. Yet they are held, both in the Theravāda and the Vaibhāshika schools, to operate simultaneously in all kinds of kāmāvachara consciousness and also in the first rūpa-dhyāna.

The Vṛitti describes the vitarka[2] as having the characteristic of grossness (audārya) of mind. It is a synonym for saṁkalpa. It contains a 'rudimentary synthesis' (vikalpa) of the differentiators of objects (vishaya nimitta) that produce it. Its activity is stimulated by the wind of ideas. It is a cause of the manifestation of the five gross sense-cognitions. The vichāra is of the characteristic subtlety (saukshmya) of mind. It is conducive to the manifestation of the mind-consciousness. Both these dharmas invariably operate in all kinds of the kāmāvachara-consciousness.

Thus here too the vitarka and vichāra are described as sthūla and sūkshma respectively. The Kośakāra raises an objection to the Vaibhāshika theory of their simultaneous operation.

After quoting and criticising several views on this controversy from the Mahā-vibhāshā, the Kośakāra explains the Sautrāntika view. According to the latter, the vitarka and vichāra are two different names given to gross and subtle states of saṁskāras that produce corresponding gross or subtle speech (vāk-samutthāpaka), and therefore, cannot operate together.[3] The Kośakāra, in consistency with this view, says that they do not operate simultaneously, but only alternatively, each to the exclusion of the other. As regards the Scriptures which clearly speak of the first rūpa-dhyāna having both these factors, he maintains that here the two factors are to be taken to belong to the same plane (bhūmitaḥ) and not to the same moment (na kshaṇataḥ). The first dhyāna appears now with vitarka and now with vichāra, but cannot have both aṅgas together.[1]

---

[1] Dhs A. III. 200-1; Vm. IV. 88-92.

[2] Adv. p. 81.

[3] Adv. p. 82.

The Dīpakāra reproduces this controversy from the Bhāshya, severely criticises the Kośakāra for his heterodox theory, and puts forth the Vaibhāshika viewpoint. The Vaibhāshikas, he says, assert only the co-existence of the vitarka and vichāra in one moment of consciousness, and not their simultaneous activity.[2] These dharmas are comparable to vidyā and avidyā or doubt and decision, which also co-exist but do not manifest together.

It may be noted that this view of the Dīpakāra is identical with the view of Saṁghabhadra, quoted and criticised by Yaśomitra. Saṁghabhadra too maintains that the vitarka and vichāra are associated with each thought, but do not reveal themselves by their action (udbhūta-vṛitti) at the same time. His examples are however, different from those of the Dīpakāra. He compares these two dharmas with rāga and moha, which are always co-existent but only one of them is active at one time.[3]

Yaśomitra, who favours the view of the Kośakāra, finds Saṁghabhadra's explanation unconvincing.[4] He says that he too accepts the principle that a certain factor of an aggregate alone manifests itself in a given condition, and not the other. But this does not apply in the case of the vitarka and vichāra as their characteristics are not fully differentiated. The Vaibhāshika contention that they possess independent characteristics, viz., grossness and subtleness, is invalid, since these two do not establish any specific difference (jāti-bheda) but only a difference of degrees of a single factor. In short, the vitarka and vichāra are not two different dharmas but only different states of a single dharma.

[1] Ibid. p. 81, notes.

[2] Adv. p. 83.

[3] Vide Adv. p. 83, n. 3.

[3] Ibid.

From this controversy it appears that originally the Vaibhāshikas, like the Theravādins, held these two factors to be simultaneously active, but modified their view under the influence of the criticism of the Kośakāra. The explanation given by Saṁghabhadra that they co-exist, but do not become active together, is consistent with the doctrine of Sarvāstivāda, according to which, all dharmas, irrespective of their mutual opposition, always remain in existence (sarvadā asti) but become active only under certain circumstances. Saṁghabhadra chooses two complementary factors like rāga and moha as his example. But from the Sarvāstivādin's point of view, even vidyā and avidyā, or saṁśaya and nirṇaya can 'co-exist'. These examples given by the Dīpakāra, therefore, show his conviction in the specific difference (jāti-bheda) between the vitarka and vichāra and his attempt to accommodate them in a single moment of consciousness, in the framework of the Sarvāstivāda.

Further speculations on the nature of these two dharmas are recorded in the Asm. of Asaṅga, in the Pañcha-skandhaka[1] of Vasubandhu, and in Sthiramati's Bhāshya on the Triṁśikā[2] of Vasubandhu. These are almost identical with the views of the old Masters (pūrvāchārya) quoted by Yaśomitra: "What is vitarka? A mental murmur of enquiry (paryeshako manojalpaḥ), which rests on the support of volition (chetanā) or speculative knowledge (prajñā), according as it does not or does include deduction (abhyūha). It is the gross state of mind. What is vichāra? A mental murmur of judgment (pratyavekshaka) which rests on the volition, etc. (as above). That is the subtleness of mind".[3] Here the vitarka refers to the state of enquiry of mind and vichāra to the state of judgment. Sthiramati explains the terms sthūlatā and sūkshmatā: Vitarka is sthūla as it seeks only the object (vastu-mātra-paryeshaṇākāratvāt). Vichāra is sūkshma as it knows that object as 'this is that' (evaṁ tad iti pūrvādhigata-nirūpaṇāt)[1]

[1] See Sakv. p. 64.

[2] Vide Adv. pp. 81-82.

[3] Ibid.

From this explanation we can conclude that the Yogāchāra and the Vijñānavādins accepted a specific difference between these two dharmas by attributing to them respectively the functions of enquiry and judgment which can appear only successively and not simultaneously.

3. Chitta-Viprayukta-Saṁskāra

After dealing with the vitarka and vichāra, the Kośakāra turns his polemic against a whole body of dharmas, grouped by the Vaibhāshikas under the name of chitta-viprayukta-saṁskāra.

In early Buddhism, saṁskāra is described by a solitary term, chetanā or volition. The saṁskāra skandha consists of six volitions corresponding to the six sense objects. But as the Ābhidharmikas analysed the mental factors and differentiated their characteristics, they formulated long lists of dharmas which had to be accommodated in the traditional formula of the five skandhas. Instead of postulating new skandhas, they included these new dharmas in the saṁskāra skandha.

This addition of new dharmas in the group of chaitta is justified by showing a functional co-ordination (samprayoga) between them and the chitta. The A. Saṅgaho speaks of three kinds of uniformities that exist between a chitta and 52 kinds of chetasikas (one vedanā, one saṁjña, and fifty saṁskāras)[2]. They arise and disappear in one time, have the same object and depend on the same base. The Vaibhāshikas also speak of five kinds of samatā (uniformity).[3] There is between the chitta and chaitta uniformity as regards time, basis, objects, essential qualities and function.

[1] Vide Adv. p. 81, notes.

[2] A. Saṅgaho, II. 1.

[3] Vide Adv. p. 85, n. 1.

Both the Theravādins and the Vaibhāshikas arrived at almost identical lists of these saṁskāras. The former enumerated 50, and the latter had 44 saṁskāras. In the formulation of these saṁskāras, the early Buddhists appear to have been influenced by the Yoga school, which also analysed various states of mind with reference to several chitta-bhūmis, samādhis, ṛiddhis and dhyānas with their attendant yogāṅgas or the means of yoga.[1] In course of time, the Ābhidharmikas, and particularly the Vaibhāshikas seem to have been much influenced by their contemporary realists like the Sāṁkhya, Vaiśeshika, and Mīmāṁsaka schools.

Over a long period and particularly during the time of the Mahā-vibhāshā, the Ābhidharmikas were engaged in studying and criticising the doctrines of these rival schools. Aśvaghosha's poems reveal a profound study of the Sāṁkhya system. Vasumitra, a leading Vibhāshā-śāstrin is extolled in the Vṛitti as the one who refuted the theory of 25 tattvas (of the Sāṁkhya) and demolished the (Vaiśeshika) doctrine of the atomic structure of the cosmos.[2] We learn from Paramārtha's 'Life of Vasubandhu'[3] that a Sāṁkhya teacher Vindhyavāsin defeated Buddhamitra, the teacher of Vasubandhu, in a debate, whereupon the latter composed the Paramārtha-saptatikā in refutation of the Sāmkhya. The Bhāshya as well as the Vṛitti contains several criticisms of the Sāṁkhya[4] and Vaiśeshika[5] theories.

A result of these criticisms and counter-criticisms was the acceptance of not only new theories but also of new dharmas and novel terms in the Vaibhāshika school. The doctrine of the sarvāstivāda bears a close resemblance to the satkāryavāda. The four traditional explanations of the sarvāstivāda[6] can be treated as interpretations of the pariṇāmavāda of the Sāṁkhya. The atomic theory of the Vaiśeshika too played a great part in formulating the Vaibhāshika theory of the dravya and saṁghāta paramāṇus. The seven categories of the Vaiśeshika greatly influenced the Vaibhāshika analysis of the nāma-rūpa and even their theory of dharma. On account of their fundamental thesis of anātmavāda (non-substantialism), the Buddhists did not recognise the Vaiśeshika distinction of padārthas as dravya (substance), guṇa (quality), karma (action), etc., but reduced all things to the status of dharmas, i.e. unique, momentary ultimate elements. It is, therefore, not surprising to find that the term dravya is conspicuous by its absence from the Pali suttas and even from the Abhidhamma. In the Vaibhāshika school, however, it almost replaces the Buddhist term dharma. Here all real dharmas are called dravya. Of the nine dravyas of the Vaiśeshika, only five, viz., substances of earth, water, fire, air and mind have their corresponding dharmas in the Theravāda Buddhism. The ākāśa was recognised by them only as a kind of matter (ākāsa-dhātu=parichcheda-rūpa), and not as a mahābhūta. In the Vaibhāshika school the four mahābhūtas came to be regarded as dravya-paramāṇus, as indivisible as the atoms of the Vaiśeshika. The ākāśa-dhātu of the Theravāda was raised here to the status of an asaṁskṛita dharma, and made a nitya-dravya as in the Vaiśeshika school. Of the remaining three dravyas of the Vaiśeshika, viz., kāla, dik and ātman, the first two were recognised by the Yogāchāras as prajñapti-dharmas. Thus with the sole exception of the ātman, all the Vaiśeshika dravyas came to be recognised in the later Ābhidharmika schools.

As in the case of the term dravya (substance), the term guṇa (quality) also is not found (in its technical sense)[1] in the Theravāda canon. But one can detect an influence of the Vaiseshika theory of guṇa and dravya in their enumeration of the derived matter (upādāya rūpa).

[1] The word guṇa occurs in the Pali Scriptures only in the sense of a string, a cord or a strand (as in the case of pañcha kāmaguṇa). It is sometimes used to mean a virtue but never in its technical sense of a quality as in the Vaiśeshika or the Jaina schools.

The Visuddhimagga enumerates the following 24 kinds of derived matter: chakkhu, sota, ghāṇa, jihvā, kāya; rūpa, sadda, gandha, rasa; itthindriya, purisindriya, jīvitindriya; hadaya-vatthu; kāyaviññatti, vachīviññatti; ākāsadhātu; rūpassa lahutā, rūpassa mudutā, rūpassa kammaññatā; rūpassa upachayo, rūpassa santati, rūpassa jaratā, rūpassa anichchatā, and kabaḷīkāro āhāro.[1]

According to the Theravādins, all these 24 upādāya rūpas are 'dhammas' and hence ought to be recognised as ultimate elements. But a large number of these can be treated rather as aspects, modes or qualities than as separate entities. This is borne out by the commentarial description of some of these dhammas and a distinction drawn between the nipphanna and anipphanna[2]-rūpa. Thus, for instance, the ākāsa-dhātu (element of space=vacuum) is called parichcheda-rūpa ('material quality of limitation'). The two viññattis (intimation by body and speech) together with the lahutā, mudutā and kammaññatā (lightness, pliancy and adaptability of matter) are called vikāra-rūpas, i.e. material qualities signifying special conditions. The upachaya, santati, jarā and anichchatā (i.e. the integration, continuance, decay and impermanence of matter) are called lakkhaṇa rūpa, i.e. the characteristics of matter. These ten kinds of rūpa are called anipphanna in order to distinguish them from the remaining 14 rūpas (and the four mahābhūtas) which are called nipphanna-rūpa. Buddhaghosa explains the nipphanna-rūpas as those which 'transcend limits, change and characteristics and which are to be seized in their intrinsic nature (sabhāva).[3] The anipphannas are contrary thereto. The Visuddhimagga-Ṭīkā explains further that the nipphanna-rūpas have their own nature (svabhāva), whereas the anipphannas are devoid of them and are known only by relating them to the svabhāva-rūpas.[4] The anipphanna rūpas are nowhere in the suttas enumerated as rūpa-dhammas. Their inclusion in the Abhidhamma suggests an influence of the Vaiśeshika school. It is certain that the commentators knew the theory of guṇa. Buddhaghosa criticises a (Vaiśeshika) theory according to which the rūpa and gandha are qualities of teja and pṛithivī, respectively.[1] The words nipphanna-rūpa and anipphanna-rūpa do not occur in the canon. They are found only in the Aṭṭhakathās. It is, therefore, possible that the commentators introduced this division in order to separate the 'real' upādāya rūpas from 'qualities', which in the later Sautrāntika terms could be designated as mere prajñapti (nominal) dharmas.

---

[1] Of these only 23 are enumerated in the Dhammasaṅgaṇi. The hadaya-vatthu is a later addition by the commentators. See DhsA. IV. 112.

[2] Also termed as parinipphanna and aparinipphanna in the Dhs A. IV. 119.

[3] Vm. XIV. 73.

[4] VmT. pp. 457-8.

A few of the so-called nipphanna rūpas can also be placed in the category of the anipphanna. The jīvitindriya, for instance, does not consist of a separate rūpa, but only a name given to the life of matter. The itthindriya and purisindriya, two 'material qualities of sex' can be treated as different aspects of the kāya. The last nipphanna rūpa, called kabaḷīkāro āhāro (edible food) is also not a separate entity but only a name given to the material quality of nutrition.

Thus out of the 24 kinds of upādāya rūpas, only nine, viz., the five sense organs and four sense objects (the phoṭṭhabba—touch object—being included in the mahābhūtas) can be considered as dharmas having intrinsic nature (svabhāva) and, therefore real.[2] As a matter of fact, these ten are identical with the ten of the eleven dharmas enumerated in both the Vaibhāshika and the Yogāchāra lists of the rūpa-dharma.[3]

Although the Vaibhāshikas did not enumerate the 'qualities' of rūpa in the rūpa-dharma, they certainly knew some of them. They recognised, for instance, the four lakshaṇas, which were proclaimed in the sūtras as being universal characteristics of not only the rūpa but of all phenomenal elements. These were not enumerated as separate dharmas in the traditional formula of the five skandhas. If a large number of new chaitasikas could be added under the saṁskāra skandha, there was no reason why these four lakshaṇas could not also be accommodated under that heading, particularly when these were specifically called 'saṁskṛita-lakshaṇas' by the sūtra. But these lakshaṇas were not exclusively chaitasika, and could not, therefore, be treated as purely mental factors, in as much as they covered even the rūpa-skandha. The origin of a novel category called the (rūpa-chitta-viprayukta-saṁskāra)[1] is perhaps to be traced to an attempt to include the lakshaṇas and such other aspects or qualities in the traditional formula of the pañcha-skandha.

[1] Vm. XIV. 43.

[2] The Sautrāntikas go still further and enumerate only the four mahābhūtas and the four objects as rerl rūpa-dharmas. See Ālambana-parīkshā, Appendix D. p. 116.

[3] The Vaibhāshikas enumerate one more rūpa, viz., avijñapti (unmanifested matter) which the Yogāchārins include in their 11th category of rūpa, called dharma-dhātu paryāpanna (matter included under dharma-dhātu). For details, see Manual of Buddhist Philosophy, pp. 118ff.

The term chitta-vippayutta is known to the Dhammasangaṇi. But there it refers only to the rūpa khandha and nibbāna.[2] It is not recognised as a separate category as in the Vaibhāshika school. The Kathāvatthu contains a controversy[3] where the opponent holds that the pariyuṭṭhānas ('outbursts' of anusayas) are chitta-vippayutta dhammas. Buddhaghosa attributes this view to the Andhakas.[4] In his commentary on another controversy on the anusayas, he says that the Andhakas, Uttarāpathakas, Mahāsāṅghikas and Sammitiyas hold that the anusayas are chitta-vippayutta.[5] According to Yaśomitra, the Vātsīputrīyas also maintained the same view.[6] The jīvitindriya was also, according to Buddhaghosa, considered as a chitta-vippayutta dhamma by Pubba-seliyas and [1] Yaśomitra explains this term fully. These dharmas are disassociated from the chitta but are more akin to it than to the rūpa-skandha. Hence they are included in the nāma-skandha. The term viprayukta is used for excluding the chaittas which are samprayukta. The term saṁskāra is used to exclude the asamskṛita dharmas. Thus the viprayukta saṁskāras are distinct from the rūpa, chitta, chaitta and amskṛita dharmas. Vide Adv. p. 85, notes.

Sammitiyas.[1] The Yogāchāra school of Asaṅga not only accepted this new category but added several dharmas of its own under that heading. Thus the category of the chitta-viprayukta-saṁskāra was not necessarily a Vaibhāshika invention ; it was known as early as the time of the Kathāvatthu and was accepted by several major and minor schools.

There is no unanimity among different schools regarding the number of saṁskāras that were enumerated under this category. The lists of only two schools, viz., the Vaibhāshika and the Yogāchāra, have come down to us. Of the former, two lists are known. The older one is given in the Asm. of Ghoshaka, and the later ones are given in the Bhāshya and the Vṛitti. The Yogāchāra list is found in the Asm. of Asaṅga.

Ghoshaka enumerates the following 17 saṁskāras :—(1) prāptiḥ (2) asaṁjñi-samāpattiḥ (3) nirodha-samāpattiḥ (4) asaṁjñi-āyatanam (5) jīvitendriyam (6) nikāya-sabhāgatā (7) sthāna-prāptiḥ (8) vastu-prāptiḥ (9) āyatana-prāptiḥ (10) jātiḥ (11) jarā (12) sthitiḥ (13) anityatā (14) nāma-kāyaḥ (15) padakāyaḥ (16) vyañjana-kāyaḥ (17) pṛithagjanatvam.

Asaṅga in his Asm.[2] drops Nos. 7, 8 and 9 of the above list and adds the following nine, bringing his total to 23 :—(1) pravṛittiḥ (2) pratiniyamaḥ (3) yogaḥ (4) javaḥ (5) anukramaḥ (6) kālaḥ (7) deśaḥ (8) saṁkhyā (9) sāmagrī.

The Kośa and the Dīpa closely follow the list of Ghoshaka. They enumerate only 13, dropping Nos. 2, 7, 8, 9 and 17 from his list, and adding one more item called aprāpti. The last 9 saṁskāras of the Yogāchāra list are omitted by them. Of these three, Ghoshaka's list is undoubtedly the oldest as he represents the period of the Mahā-vibhāshā. The Yogāchārins seem to have modified his list by including Nos. 7, 8 and 9 in No. 1=(prāpti). The neo-Vaibhāshikas like the Kośakāra modified it still further by including No. 2 in No. 4. They replaced the pṛithagjanatva (No. 17) by their new dharma, viz., aprāpti, since the former is only an alābha (non-obtainment) of ārya-mārga.

[2] Asm. p. 10.

At least five items in these list, viz., the four lakshaṇas and the jīvitendriya, have corresponding dharmas in the upādāya-rūpa of the Theravāda. But the Theravādins enumerated the lakshaṇas as 'qualities' devoid of saṁskṛita-lakshaṇas[1] like the Vaiśeshika guṇas which are aguṇavat. The Vaibhāshikas enumerated them as 'dravya', i.e. having intrinsic nature, abiding in the three times and causing the origination, subsistence, decay and extinction of all phenomenal existence. A logical conclusion of such a step was to postulate upa-lakshaṇas (secondary characteristics) like jāti-jāti, sthiti-sthiti etc. to these lakshaṇas[2] which was ridiculed by the Sautrāntikas as absurd and involving the fallacy of an infinite regress.

The same rule is applied in the case of the first two saṁskāras, viz., the prāpti and aprāpti. The former is a saṁskāra ('force') which controls the collection or obtainment of certain dharmas in a given santāna (stream of life), as for instance, in the case of an arhat there is a prāpti of aśaiksha dharmas. The aprāpti is a 'force' which prevents this prāpti, as for instance in the case of a pṛithagjana, there is a non-collection of the ārya-dharmas. As in the case of the lakshanas the Vaibhāshika here postulates such additional dharmas as prāpti-prāpti and aprāpti-aprāpti for explaining the obtainment of the prāpti and the prevention of aprāpti, respectively, again exposing his theory to the fallacy of regress.

One can detect an influence of the Vaiśeshika in this 'dravya-vāda' of the Vaibhāshika. This influence is unmistakably seen in a few other saṁskāras of this list. The Vaiśeshika category of sāmānya (generality) for instance, is unknown to the Pali canon. The Buddhists being pluralists, non-substantialists and vibhajya-vādins always tended to oppose the reality of sāmānya, as the latter was a stepping-stone towards a unity, a substance or even to the theory of brahman of the Advaita school. Their formulas of the skandha, āyatana, dhātu, etc. were primarily aimed at removing false notions of unity (ekatva-grāha)[3]. In the later works on Buddhist logic the sāmānya is unanimously described as a mere conceptual construction (vikalpa) imposed on the discrete, unique and momentary dharmas, and hence unreal.[1] But this sāmānya creeps up, in the Vaibhāshika category of the viprayukta, under the guise of sabhāgatā. Like the parā-sattā and the aparā-sattā of the Vaiśeshika, the Vaibhāshika sabhāgatā is also divided into sattva-sabhāgatā (which is common to all beings—abhinnā) and dharma-sabhāgatā (which is found in smaller groups like men, women, layman, monk, etc.)[2]

The Sautrāntika Kośakāra rightly observes that in recognising the sabhāgatā as a 'dravya', distinct from the skandha, āyatana or dhātu (which constitute a sattva or a dharma), the Vaibhāshika has only supported the Vaiśeshika category of sāmānya. The Vaibhāshika seeks to support his sabhāgatā by a sūtra passage where the word nikāya-sabhāga is mentioned, and asks for an explanation of the notion of generality. The Sautrāntika points out that the sūtra does not warrant any recognition of the sabhāgatā as a distinct dravya. The generality is only a notion (prajñapti) and not a real dharma.[3] "And if all notions were to be treated as real", continues the Kośakāra, "why not assume distinct dharmas for the notions of number, magnitude, distinctness, conjunction, disjunction, remoteness, nearness, etc., which are treated as realities by the heretic schools?"[4] Indeed, the last nine viprayukta-saṁskāras of the Yogāchāra list seem to represent these notions treated as reals in the Vaiśeshika school. Of these nine, the following six, viz., the pravṛitti, java, kāla, deśa, saṁkhyā and sāmagrī correspond respectively to the pravṛitti (a kind of prayatna), vega (a kind of saṁskāra) kāla (a dravya), dik (a dravya), saṁkhyā (a guṇa) and saṁyoga (a guṇa). The anukrama can be taken to correspond to the paratva and aparatva, two guṇas of the Vaiśeshika. The only two, viz., the pratiniyama and yoga (manifoldness and conformity of hetu and phala) have no corresponding reals in the Vaiśeshika list.

The acceptance of these Vaiśeshika reals exclusively by the Yogāchāras did not, however, make them realists like the Vaibhāshika. Unlike the latter, they treated all viprayukta-Saṁskāras as mere notions (prajñapti). And in the case of the last nine saṁskāras, which directly correspond to the Vaiseshika padārthas, they interpreted them merely as different names of the hetu-phala.[1]

The Sautrāntikas also recognise these notions, but severely oppose the Vaibhāshikas for accepting them as dravya-dharmas or reals. They point out that the so-called viprayukta-saṁskāras have neither own nature (sva-bhāva), nor are they preached in the sūtras. The II Kośasthāna of the Bhāshya[2] contains long and lively controversies between the Sautrāntika and the Vaibhāshika on the validity of each and every item of the viprayukta-saṁskāra. The Kośakāra examines the Scriptures quoted by the Vaibhāshika, analyses their arguments, ridicules their dogmatic realism and finally accuses them of supporting the heretic schools.

A counter attack to this polemic of the Kośakāra is found in our Vṛitti. The Dīpakāra indirectly refers to the Kośakāra as an infant, ignorant of the Abhidharma[3] and boldly declares that he will prove the śva-bhāvas of these saṁskāras, and will also quote sūtras in his favour.[4] Unfortunately, a large number of folios containing these lively controversies are lost. Discussions on prāpti and aprāpti are entirely lost. The controversies on the nirodha-samāpatti are severely interrupted, since only a prima facie argument has survived which contains a view of the Kośakāra condemned as 'unbuddhistic' by the Vṛitti.[5] The treatment of sabhāgatā and āsaṁjñika is almost identical with the Vaibhāshika explanations of these saṁskāras in the Bhāshya. The Vṛitti here borrows several passages from the latter. The Dīpakāra does not advance any new arguments but contents himself with a remark that the Kośakāra in comparing the sabhāgatā with the Vaiśeshika sāmānya has only made a futile attempt to see a similarity of the kind which we find obtaining between pāyasa (milk-porridge) and vāyasa (a crow).[1] The only important discussions available to us, therefore, are on the jīvitendriya,[2] the four lakshaṇas and the last three saṁskāras called nāma-kāya, pada-kāya and vyañjana-kāya.[3] Even in the case of these topics, the Vaibhāshika arguments of the Dīpakāra are not different from those given in the Bhāshya, which are well known through Poussin's L'Abhidharma-kośa and Stcherbatsky's The Central Conception of Buddhism.

4. Manas-karma

Three kinds of purely mental (evil) actions are spoken of in the sūtras. The Sañchetaniya-sūtra, for instance, says: "How are the three kinds of volitional acts committed through mind? Here O monks, one becomes covetous (abhidhyālu), full of ill will (vyāpanna-chitta) and holder of a wrong view (mithyā-dṛishṭi)."[4] According to this sūtra, the abhidhyā, vyāpāda and mithyā-dṛishṭi are purely mental acts. Since the Lord has said that karma is volition, the Dārshṭāntikas maintain that these three being mental actions are identical with volitions (chetanā).

The Vaibhāshikas do not agree with this Dārshṭāntika view. According to them the abhidhyā, vyāpāda and mithyā-dṛishṭi are passions (kleśas) that produce an evil volition (karma), and not actions by themselves. They are not manas-karma (mental actions) but only mano-duścharita.[5] In the sūtra these three are identified with chetanā because the latter arises through them.

The Kośakāra as usual, favours the Dārshṭāntika viewpoint.[6] The Dīpakāra asserts the Vaibhāshika position without advancing any new arguments in his favour, and criticises the Kośakāra for favouring the Dārshṭāntika interpretation of the Sañchetaniya-sūtra.[1]

The reason for the Vaibhāshika treatment of abhidhyā, vyāpāda and mithyā-dṛishṭi as passions distinct from volitions is perhaps to be found in the Ābhidharmika theory that two volitions (chetanās) cannot operate in one moment. According to the Abhidharma all evil volitions (like killing, theft, etc.) are prompted and sustained by one of the three, abhidhyā, vyāpāda or mithyā-dṛishṭi. In the case of an evil act like prāṇātipāta, for instance, one of these three produces a vadhaka-chetanā (a volition to kill) which is essentially accompained, till the accomplishment of the act of killing, by vyāpāda (ill will). If vyāpāda is also treated as a chetanā then there will be two volitions (vyāpāda and vadhaka-chetanā) operating in one moment. The Vaibhāshika, therefore, maintains that these three are to be treated as kleśas (passions) and not as volitions (karma).

The Pali commentators also seem to recognise a similar theory. The Aṭṭhasālinī states that of the ten evil karmas (viz., Prāṇātipāta etc.) the first seven are chetanā-dhamma (i.e. identical with volition), whereas the last three, viz., abhijjhā, vyāpāda and michchhādiṭṭhi are chetanā-sampayuttā-dhammā (i.e. factors associated with the first seven volitions).[2]

In the Bhāshya the Kośakāra attributes the view of the volitional nature of these three dharmas to the Dārshṭāntika. The Dīpakāra, however, attributes it to a kind of Śākyans (i.e. Buddhists) called 'sthitibhāgīya' whom he abuses as 'śva-lāṅgūlika' (having a dog's tail).[3] The significance of this abuse is not clear. It is common to compare an incurable person to a dog's tail. For instance, in the Pañcha-tantra it is said that it is as difficult to reform a rascal as it is to take the kink from a dog's tail.[4] By calling them śva-lāṅgūlika the Dīpakāra also seems to be abusing the Dārshṭāntikas (i.e. the Sautrāntikas) for their persistence in maintaining views repugnant to the Abhidharma. In a subsequent place the Dīpakāra again rebukes them for their habit of repeatedly bringing forth (apparently inconsistent) sūtras against the Vaibhāshika.[1]

The term sthitibhāgīya is not used, either by the Kośakāra or by Yaśomitra to indicate the Dārshṭāntika. This term usually occurs with other three terms, viz., hānabhāgīya, viśeshabhāgīya and nirvedhabhāgīya,[2] where it means 'that which is conducive to enduring or lasting', of a particular state of mind. This meaning does not seem to be intended here. The word sthiti in this term most probably means pravāha or santati. The Sautrāntikas do not recognise sthiti (subsistence) as a separate saṁskṛita-lakshaṇa, because they consider that it is a name given to the series of momentary dharmas (santati)[3]. By sthitibhāgīya, therefore, the Dīpakāra means one who belongs to or is heading for the (theory of) santati, a term which a Vaibhāshika could use as an abuse to the Sautrāntika. But the use of the term sthitibhāgīya need not be taken as purely abusive. We learn from other sources that the Sautrāntika school was also known by two other names, viz., Santānavāda and Saṅkrāntivāda. Vasumitra in his samaya-bhedoparachana-chakra[4] attributes the following three doctrines to this school:— "(i) skandhas transmigrate from one world to the other: hence the name Saṅkrāntivāda. (ii) There are the mūlāntika-skandhas and also eka-rasa-skandhas. (iii) An average man (pṛithagjana) also possesses the potentiality of becoming a Buddha (lit. in the state of average man there are also divine things, ārya-dharmas)".

Elucidating these doctrines and particularly the term skandha, J. Masuda says that a commentary on Vasumitra's work, called 'Shu-chi interprets the term skandha as bījas. The eka-rasa-skandhas are interpreted as bījas of one taste, which continue to exist from the time immemorial without changing their nature. The ārya-dharmas stated in the last doctrine are interpreted as anāsrava-bījas.[1]

Very little is known about these Sautrāntika doctrines or about their theory of saṁkrānti. The term sthitibhāgīya used for the Dārshṭāntika (i.e. the Sautrāntika) in the Vṛitti may refer not only to an ordinary santati but to the santati of the bījas or seeds of good and evil which form the next point of issue between the Kośakāra and the Dīpakāra.

5. Anuśaya

We have seen above an Ābhidharmika distinction between a volition (karma) and a passion (kleśa). The kleśas are like roots which produce as well as sustain an evil volition. Abhidhyā, vyāpāda and mithyā-dṛishṭi are not called roots but are recognised as intensive states of three roots of evil (akuśala-mūla), viz., lobha, dvesha and moha respectively. All evil volitions are essentially rooted and spring from one or the other of these three basic passions (mūla-kleśa).

Corresponding to these three roots of evil, the Buddhists recognise three roots of good (volitions), viz., alobha, advesha and amoha. All good volitions spring from these three kuśala-mūlas, the intensive states of which are called anabhidhyā, avyāpāda and samyak-dṛishṭi respectively. Thus the kuśala-mūlas and the akuśala-mūlas are incompatible in nature and exclude each other in their operation in a single moment.

Whereas their intensified states can be overcome by the attainment of the first three lokottara paths, the basic passions (akuśala-mūlas) are not completely annihilated until one attains arhatship. A srota-āpanna, for instance overcomes mithyā-dṛishṭi, but still possesses its root, viz., moha. A sakṛidāgāmin overcomes grosser forms of vyāpāda but still possesses its root, viz., dvesha. An anāgāmin completely overcomes vyāpāda but he is not free from the akuśala-mūlas. Only an arhat brings an end to these roots of all evil volitions.

[1] J. Masuda, Asia Major, 2, 1925, pp. 67-9, notes. Also see Lamotte, MCB. IV. (1936), pp. 163ff.

If the akuśala-mūlas are not annihilated till the attainment of arhatship and if they are incompatible with the kuśala-mūlas, how are we to explain the operation of kuśala-mūlas or of kuśala volitions in a mundane (laukika) existence? Being incompatible they cannot operate simultaneously. Nor can they operate successively, for succession demands a certain element of homogeneity between the preceding and succeeding moments. If a kuśala chitta were to follow an akuśala chitta, then it will depend for its nature on a heterogeneous cause. It will amount to an admission of an unacceptable position that good springs out of evil or vice versa.

The Theravādins avoid this dilemma by postulating a theory that the akuśala and kuśala chittas never follow each other without an intervening avyākṛita (indeterminate, i.e. vipāka) chitta. An akuśala chitta-vīthi can be succeeded by a kuśala chitta-vīthi only after an intervention of a bhavaṅga-chitta, which is necessarily a vipāka-chitta.

The Vaibhāshikas seek to avoid this difficulty by postulating a chitta-viprayukta saṁskāra called prāpti, a force which controls the collection of particular kinds of elements, and another saṁskāra called aprāpti which prevents such a collection. Thus, for instance, when an akuśala chitta is followed by a kuśala chitta the latter is brought into operation by prāpti of the kuśala dharmas which is at the same time assisted by the aprāpti which prevents the rise of akuśala dharmas.

The Sautrāntikas reject both these theories. They do not accept the theory of the Theravādins, presumably on the grounds that an avyākṛita chitta is not more helpful than the akuśala chitta, in as much as both are equally inefficient to produce a kuśala chitta. They reject the Vaibhāshika dharmas called prāpti and aprāpti on the grounds that these in turn need to be produced by another prāpti and aprāpti, a position which leads only to an infinite regress.

The Sautrāntikas explain the operation of kuśala and akuśala dharmas by postulating a theory of seeds. There are three kinds of seeds: seeds of evil and seeds of good, and those which are indeterminate. The seeds of evil (akuśala-bīja) are called anuśaya; the seeds of good are called kuśala-dharma-bīja. Before we proceed to an examination of the latter we shall note here views of several Buddhist schools on the nature of the anuśayas, a topic which holds a clue to the theory of seeds.

The Pali Scriptures as well as commentaries contain several references to and controversies on the anuśayas. The term anuśaya is derived from śī (śaya), to lie, and means 'to live along with' or 'to cling to'. It is always used in the sense of a bias, a proclivity, a persistence of a dormant or latent disposition of mind leading to all kinds of evil volitions. Buddhaghosa says that a passion is called anusaya because of its pertinacity. It ever and again tends to become the condition to the arising of ever new passions.[1] The Kośakāra calls it the root of existence.[2] The Vṛitti describes it as that which follows through the series of mind.[3] Seven such evil pre-dispositions are enumerated in the Scriptures. They are kāma-rāga, pratigha, dṛishṭi, vichikitsā, māna, bhava-rāga and avidyā. The three akuśala-mūlas as well as their accessory kleśas are included in these seven anuśayas.

The outbursts of these dormant passions are called pariyuṭṭhāna (Skt. paryavasthāna). There are seven pariyuṭṭhānas corresponding to the seven anusayas, bearing the same names.[4] In the Vaibhāshika tradition different kleśas are enumerated under the paryavasthāna. The Vṛitti enumerates ten, viz., mraksha, īrshyā, ahrī, anapatrāpya, styāna, middha, auddhatya, krodha, mātsarya and kaukṛitya.[5] But this seems to be an Ābhidharmika tradition. The Sautrantikas do not treat these ten as paryavasthāna. They agree with the Theravādin tradition (based on sūtra) in treating the paryavasthāna as outbursts of the latent anuśayas.

The relation between an anusaya and a pariyuṭṭhāna is made clear in the Mahā-Māluṁkya-sutta.[1] This sutta deals with saṁyojanas (bonds or fetters) like kāma-chchhanda, vyāpāda, vichikitsā, etc., which chain all beings to the lower life. It is said there that heretic ascetics used to ridicule this theory of saṁyojanas by saying, "An infant is not conscious of lusts of the flesh (kāma), much less can passion (kāma-chhanda) arise within it, its sensual propensities (kāma-rāgo) being latent only (anuseti)."[2]

The implication of this criticism is not clear. According to the Aṭṭhakathā these ascetics believed that a person is associated with the passions (kilesa) only when they operate or beset him but at other times he is disassociated from passions.[3] Apparently the heretics believed that an infant is free from kleśas (passions).

The Buddhists do not accept this position. According to them even an infant is in possession of kleśas, because the latter are present in him in their dormant state (anusaya) and become active when there arise suitable conditions for their operation (pariyuṭṭhāna). This implies that when the passions are not operating they always remain in a dormant state. If they are always present in mind then the latter is always akuśala, for a kuśala can neither co-exist nor operate simultaneously with an akuśala. Consequently, there will be no kuśala chitta as long as the latent passions are not removed, and they will not be removed without a kuśala chitta.

Different solutions are put forward by different schools to this problem.[4] The Theravādins (despite their objection to the heretical view noted above) and the Vaibhāshikas denied the existence of anuśayas apart from the paryavasthānas. According to them a mind is akuśala only when passions are in operation. There is no such thing as purely latent passions. The Vātsīputrīyas maintained a difference between the anuśayas and paryavasthānas. But they said that the anuśayas are chitta-viprayukta-saṁskāras, and hence could co-exist with kuśala dharmas. But paryavasthānas are chitta-samprayukta-saṁskāras and therefore cannot operate with kuśala dharmas. They include the anuśayas in prāpti, a viprayukta-saṁskāra of the Vaibhāshika list.

The Sautrāntikas maintained that the anuśayas as well as the kuśala elements (bījas) co-exist side by side in the form of subtle seeds, but only one of them operates at one time. When the anuśayas operate (i.e. become paryavasthānas), the mind is akuśala. When the seeds of kuśala operate the mind is kuśala.

All these views are well represented in a controversy on the meaning of a sūtra passage preserved in the Bhāshya, the Vṛitti and also in the Aṭṭhakathās. A question is raised whether a term like rāgānuśaya should be taken as a karmadhāraya or as a genitive tatpurusha compound. The former (i.e. rāga eva anuśayaḥ) goes against a sūtra passage which says: "Here a person has a mind beset and obsessed (paryavasthita) by no sensuality (kāma-rāga); he knows the real escape therefrom; this obsession of sensuality (kāma-rāga-paryavasthāna) if vigorously combated is destroyed together with its propensities thereto (sānuśayaṁ prahīyate)."[1]

By using the term 'sānuśayaṁ' the Sūtra makes it clear that paryavasthāna and anuśaya are not identical. The Vātsīputrīya here suggests that the term sānuśayaṁ means 'together with anuśaya, i.e. a viprayukta-saṁskāra called prāpti. But this contention goes against Abhidharma where it is said that the rāgānuśaya is associated with three kinds of feelings. Prāpti being a viprayukta cannot associate with a chaitasika. Therefore, anuśaya cannot be a viprayukta.[2]

---

[1] Vide Adv. p. 221.

[2] Ibid. n. 4.

Faced with this dilemma the Vaibhāshika, regardless of the sūtra, states that the term rāgānuśaya should be taken as a karmadhāraya compound. He resolves the sūtra opposition by interpreting the term sānuśaya as sānubandha,[1] i.e. together with its power of producing a new kleśa. He also gives an alternative suggestion that the sūtra identifies anuśaya with prāpti only figuratively; the Abhidharma is definitive when it says that rāga (paryavasthāna) is (identical with) anuśaya.[2]

The Theravādins also identify pariyuṭṭhāna with anusaya. Commenting on the sūtra words 'sānusayo pahīyati', Buddhaghosa observes that some people on the basis of this expression maintain that the saṁyojanas (here identical with pariyuṭṭhānas) are different from anusaya. They should be refuted, he says, by the simile of a person sleeping with his head covered. The person is not different from (his) head.[3] Buddhaghosa takes note of an objection that if saṁyojanas and anusayas are identical then the Buddha's criticism of the heretic ascetics (for holding the view that an infant has no passions) is meaningless.[4] Buddhaghosa does not give any convincing answer to this criticism but asserts his position by repeating that the same passion is called saṁyojana because it binds, and is also called anusaya because it is not renounced (appahīna).[5]

The Kathāvatthu records several controversies on the anusayas. The Andhakas held that the anusayas are different from pariyuṭṭhāna.[6] The Mahāsāṁghikas and the Sammitiyas maintained that the anusayas are indeterminate (abyākatā), without good or bad roots (ahetukā) and therefore chitta-vippayutta.[7] The arguments of these schools are the same as noted above that if the anuśayas are akuśala and chitta-samprayukta there will never be an occasion for the rise of kuśala consciousness.

Buddhaghosa's reply to these schools is the same, that the anusayas are identical with pariyuṭṭhānas. He once more returns to this topic in his commentary on the Yamaka. There also he repeats the same arguments and adds that these passions are called anusaya not because they are different from pariyuṭṭhāna but because they are strong passions (thāmagata kileso) and because they arise on obtaining suitable conditions for their operation (anusentīti anurūpaṁ kāraṇaṁ labhitvā uppajjantīti......)[1].

It is clear from these discussions that the Theravādin as well as the Vaibhāshika interpretation of the term sānuśaya, and the subsequent identification of the anuśayas with paryavasthāna are contrary to the sūtra quoted above. They show a determined effort to uphold the Abhidharma in preference to the Sūtra. The Sautrāntika takes strong exception to the Ābhidharmika theories and puts forth his theory of bīja. He says that the word rāgānuśaya should be taken as a genitive tatpurusha, i.e. anuśaya of rāga. Asked further if this anuśaya is a samprayukta or a viprayukta, the Sautrāntika says that it is neither, because it is not a separate dravya (reality).[2] When a kleśa (like rāga) is dormant, it is called anuśaya. When it is awakened, it is called paryavasthāna.[3] When it is dormant it does not appear but persists in the form of a seed. This form of seed is nothing else but an inherent power of mind to produce a (new) passion which is itself born of a past passion. It is comparable to an inherent power of yielding rice found in a sprout which is also born of rice.[4]

The Kośakāra openly favours this Sautrāntika theory of bīja (attributed in the Vṛitti to the Dārshṭāntika) in his Bhāshya. The Dīpakāra borrows this whole controversy from the latter and remarks that he will expose this indolence of the Sautrāntika Kośakāra in properly grasping the words of the Buddha. He refers to his other work called Tattva-saptati,[1] where he says he has fully dealt with this topic, and adds that the bīja imagined by the Sautrāntika, which is described as a mere power (śakti) or application (bhāvanā) or impression (vāsanā) of mind cannot stand any scrutiny. For this bīja could either be identical with or different from the mind. If the former, there is no point in speaking about it. If the latter, then it must be a samprayukta (associated) or viprayukta element, a position unacceptable to the Sautrāntika. If it is maintained that the bīja is neither identical with, nor different from the mind, and thus conforms to a middle course, then also it is denied, for such a middle course is impossible in the case of a bīja which is an unreality like a stick made of sky-flowers.[2]

[4] Adv. p. 222.

These brief arguments of the Dīpakāra are identical with Saṁghabhadra's criticism against the theory of bīja. We have noted above a Vaibhāshika theory that a viprayukta saṁskāra called prāpti brings into operation a particular set of dharmas (to the exclusion of others) in a given moment, and thus determines the nature of a santati either as impure (akuśala) or pura (kuśala). While dealing with this topic, the Kośakāra refutes the Vaibhāshika on the grounds that the seeds (bījas) of kuśala or akuśala accumulated in a santati determine the character of the latter. He defines the bīja as nāma-rūpa, i.e. the complex of the five skandhas capable of producing a fruit either immediately or mediately by means of a pariṇāmaviśesha of the santati.[3]

This theory of bīja advocated by the Kośakāra is subjected to a severe criticism in the "Nyāyānusāra" of Saṁghabhadra. Yaśomitra quotes a fairly long passage from the latter and defends the Sautrāntika position.[4] Saṁghabhadra's main criticism of the theory of bīja (i.e. śakti-viśesha) is that it could be either different from or identical with the mind. If it is a separate entity. then it is prāpti, for the dispute then is only on naming it. If, however, it is identical with mind, then it will result in the fault of mixture or confusion (sāṅkarya-dosha) of good and bad seeds. For surely the Sautrāntika will admit that a mind possesses seeds of both the good (kuśala) as well as bad (akuśala), of sāsrava as well as anāsrava elements. If they are all accumulated in one chitta what is there to determine the nature of a particular chitta as kuśala or akuśala or avyākṛita? Yaśomitra's reply to this criticism is that the sāṅkarya-dosha would arise only if the bījas were to be identical with the mind. But we maintain, he says, that a bīja is neither identical with, nor different from the mind, because a bīja is not a separate entity (dravya) but only a prajñapti (nominal) dharma.

Yaśomitra further states that even if a bīja is considered identical with chitta, there is no fault: for, a kuśala chitta which has arisen would in that case implant its seed in a (subsequent) chitta of its own santāna, the latter chitta being either of the same kind (kuśala) or of the opposite kind (akuśala). Thereafter (tataḥ) the (second) chitta would arise as qualified (determined) by the first only in accordance with the principal that a specific effect arises from a specific cause (kāraṇa-viśesha) [i.e. if the second chitta is anya-jātīya, the bīja lies dormant]......Nor does the fact that a specific śakti is implanted by a kuśala-chitta in an akuśala-chitta entail (iti) that the akuśala becomes kuśala or vice versa, since it is only a specific śakti [i.e. it cannot produce effects which, by its very nature, it is not competent to produce] also called bīja or vāsanā. These are all synonyms[1]

Even the Vaibhāshikas, he says, will have to resort to some such theory to explain the phenomena of succession of two heterogeneous chittas. They also believe that an akuśala can be succeeded by a kuśala. Do the Vaibhāshikas here agree that the kuśala is produced by an akuśala? If they do not agree then they deny samanantara-pratyaya. If they agree then they must explain what kind of power (śakti) it is that produced a kuśala chitta. If this power is akuśala it cannot produce kuśala. If it is kuśala then it cannot remain in an akuśala chitta. It is, therefore, wrong of the Vaibhāshikas to accuse us of maintaining that an akuśala seed would become the cause of kuśala chitta. We never maintained that a kuśala seed deposited in an akuśala chitta transforms the latter. What we maintain is that this kuśala seed remains there and produces either immediately or in succession a corresponding kuśala chitta. This power of producing a new chitta is what we call a bīja. It is not an independent entity but only a nominal thing (prajñapti-mātra).

It appears from Yaśomitra's explanation that the theory of bīja was employed by the Sautrāntika primarily to replace the Vaibhāshika dharma called prāpti in explaining the phenomena of immediate succession (samanatarotpāda) between two chittas of heterogeneous nature, and secondarily to reconcile the abiding nature of santati with the momentary flashes of dharma. Their theory that the bījas are neither identical with nor different from the mind bears a close resemblance to the Vātsīputrīya theory of pudgala which is also described as neither different from nor identical with the five skandhas.[1] But whereas the Vātsīputrīya claims reality for his pudgala, the Sautrāntika insists on the nominality (prajñapti-mātra) of the bījas and thus escapes the condemnation which he inflicts on the former for maintaining a heresy. On the other hand his theory that the mind is a depository of good and bad seeds capable of yielding new seeds in the series of mind foreshadows the theory of ālaya-vijñāna (also called mūla or bīja-vijñāna) of the Vijñānavāda Buddhism.[2]

6. Kuśala-Dharma-Bīja

Although the Theravādins do not recognise this Sautrāntika theory of bīja, there is substantial evidence pointing to its origin in the suttas. The Aṅg. nikāya contains a long sutta dealing with the operation of kuśala and akuśala-mūlas in six kinds of persons.[1] In the case of the first three of these persons a comparison is made with good or bad seed (bīja) sown in a fertile or stony field. In the case of the first person, for instance, it is said: "There is a person endowed with kuśala as well as akuśala dharmas. In course of time his kuśala dharmas disappear, and akuśala dharmas appear. But since his kuśala-mūlas are not completely annihilated, new kuśala dharmas appear from that (unannihilated) kuśala-mūla. Thus this person becomes in future one who does not fall (from the holy life). His kuśala is comparable to whole seeds (akhaṇḍa bīja) sown in a cultivated fertile field, capable of yielding abundant fruits."[2]

This Scripture is favourable to the Sautrāntika theory of bīja. It supports his contention that the kuśala and akuśala co-exist in the form of seeds which give rise in a subsequent time to their corresponding kuśala or akuśala thoughts, and thus determine the nature of a particular santati as subject to decay or subject to growth.

The Vaibhāshikas also read this sūtra in their Scriptures. But they maintain that it refers not to the theory of bīja but to their theory of prāpti. When, therefore, the sūtra says that a person is samanvāgata (endowed) with kuśala and akuśala dharmas,[3] it means that he has the prāpti of these dharmas. According to them samanvāgama and prāpti are synonyms[4] A person cannot be endowed with kuśala and akuśala in one moment, because these two are samprayukta dharmas. But their prāpti being viprayukta can co-exist and thus cause the rise of kuśala and akuśala dharmas in favourable circumstances.

[1] Aṅg. III. pp. 404-9. Vide Adv. p. 168, n. 1.

[2] Ibid.

[3] Adv. p. 166.

[4] Adv. p. 87.

In support of this contention the Vaibhāshika quotes the following passage from the same sūtra: "A person is endowed with kuśala as well as akuśala dharmas. His kuśala dharmas disappear. But there is in him the root (mūla) of kuśala not destroyed. Even this kuśala-mūla is in course of time completely annihilated, whereupon he comes to be designated as a samuchchhinna-kuśala-mūla."[1]

Here arises a problem regarding the rise of a new kuśala-chitta in the santati of such a person. The Vaibhāshika solves it by postulating the theory of prāpti which ushers in a new kuśala-chitta independently of the seeds of kuśala. But according to the Sautrāntika a kuśala chitta can arise only out of its seeds. In the absence of the latter, therefore, a samuchchhinna-kuśala-mūla will have no possibility of having a kuśala chitta. Consequently he will be doomed to have only akuśala chittas till enternity.

Indeed the Theravādins, on account of their rule that a kuśala cannot succeed an akuśala, and because of their non-recognition of the theory of prāpti, arrived precisely at such a fateful conclusion. They maintained that a samucchchhinna-kuśala-mūla was incapable of producing a kuśala chitta, and sought to support this theory by the following Scripture: "Take the case, bhikkhus, of a person who is possessed with entirely black akuśala states (ekanta-kāḷakehi akusala-dhammehi), he it is who once immersed, is immersed for ever."[2] Commenting on this, Buddhaghosa says: "The term ekanta-kāḷaka means those grave wrong views (michchhā-diṭṭhi) which deny the result of karma: natthikavāda, ahetukavāda and akiriyāvāda. A person like Makkhali Gosāla who is possessed with these grave wrong views becomes the food of the fire of lower and lower hells. For such a person there is no emergence from worldly existence."[3]

But neither of these alternatives (viz. of prāpti and of eternal doom) is acceptable to the Sautrāntika. The Kośakāra here puts forth a bold and original solution to this problem. He says that we should distinguish between two kinds of kuśala dharmas. There are some kuśala dharmas which are innate, which do not presuppose any effort (ayatna-bhāvi) but are always present in any given condition (upapatti-lābhika). Then there are other kinds of kuśala dharmas which are obtained only by effort or practice of meditations (prāyogika). The former, i.e. the innate kuśala dharmas are never completely annihilated. When a person on account of holding a grave mithyā-dṛishṭi becomes samuchchhinna-kuśala-mūla, he destroys only his prāyogika kuśala-mūlas. His innate kuśala dharmas remain in the form of bījas intact in his santati from which arise new kuśala dharmas in a favourable condition.[1]

[3] Adv. p. 169. notes.

The statement of the Kośakāra that even a samuchchhinna -kuśala-mūla possesses a subtle element of kuśala is not free from contradiction. The Bhāshya does not contain any criticism of this incompatible position. Even Yaśomitra who defends the theory of bīja against a criticism from Saṁghabhadra is silent on this contradictory statement of the Kośakāra. Fortunately, a brief criticism of this major controversy has survived in our Vṛitti. The Dīpakāra gives the meaning of the term samuchchhinna-kuśala-mūla as understood in the Vaibhāshika tradition, and criticises the theory of bīja as propounded by the Kośakāra.

According to the Vaibhāshikas, the mithyā-dṛishṭi and the kuśala-mūlas each consists of three basic grades, viz., mṛidu (subtle or slight) madhya (of medium nature) and adhimātra (extreme). Each of these three grades is further divided into these three, e.g. mṛidu-mṛidu......adhimātra-adhimātra.

The kuśala-mūlas pertaining to the arūpāvachara and the rūpāvachara are destroyed by the mṛidu and madhya mithyā-dṛishṭis.[2] The adhimātra mithyā-dṛishṭi destroys the prāyogika kuśala-mūlas pertaining to the kāma world, leaving in such a person only the innate or the upapatti-lābhika roots of good. But when a person (like Maskarī Gośālīputra for instance) comes to hold such extremely grave (adhimātra-adhimātra) wrong views as nāstikavāda, ahetukavāda or akriyāvāda, then he destroys even these innate and the most subtle (upapatti-lābhika) kuśala-mūlas pertaining to the kāma loka, whereupon he is called a samuchchhinna-kuśala-mūla.

[1] Sakv. p. 147. Vide Adv. p. 168, n. 1.

[2] The Kośakāra gives several views ln the manner in which the kuśala-mūlas are destroyed. Vide Adv. p. 167, n. 1. See LVPAk. IV. 79ab.

After stating this Vaibhāshika theory of the loss of kuśala dharmas the Dīpakāra turns to the Kośakāra's definition of a samuchchhinna-kuśala-mūla. This he condemns as contrary to the Scriptures where it is specifically stated that the kuśala-mūlas are completely annihilated. He then criticises the theory of bīja with the argument that the kuśala and akuśala being incompatible like light and darkness cannot coexist at one time. Even if they coexist, in the case of a samuchchhinna-kuśala-mūla, the kuśala elements are entirely lost. How can a new kuśala arise in this person? If it arises from the akuśala then one may as well argue that rice is obtained from barley seeds or that mithyā-dṛishṭi is produced by right thinking.[1] Thus the Kośakāra's theory of bīja and the consequent wrong definition of a samuchchhinna-kuśala-mūla do not stand the test of either the Scriptures or of reasoning.

The Kośakāra's definition of the term samuchchhinna-kuśala-mūla is identical with the Yogāchāra definition of this term. In the Mahāyāna-Sūtrālaṅkāra only the imminent liberation of a samuchchhinna-kuśala-mūla is denied.[2] This suggests that he may attain parinirvāna in the distant future. This would mean that according to the Yogāchāras such a person is not completely devoid of a kuśala-mūla. The contention of the Kośakāra that the innate kuśala-mūlas are never entirely destroyed marks a still further departure from the orthodox Hīnayāna. It implies that unlike the akuśala-bījas which are completely annihilated, the elements of kuśala persist throughout the series of existence. This is a characteristically Mahāyānist view in as much as it holds an assurance of liberation even for a person like Maskarī Gośālīputra who comes to hold the gravest of wrong views.

[1] Adv. pp. 169-71.

[2] Msa. III. 11. See Studies in the Laṅkāvatārasūtra, p. 220.

The Kośakāra does not give further details of this incorruptible element of kuśala. Unlike the elements of akuśala which are only sāsrava, the kuśala elements are of two kinds, viz., sāsrava and anāsrava. The former pertains to the (kuśala) kāma, rūpa and arūpa bhavas. The anāsrava kuśalas are those which produce the lokottara (super-mundane) states like arhatship or Buddhahood. Is it possible that the incorruptible kuśala-bīja spoken of by the Kośakāra represents the anāsrava-kuśala-bīja leading to nirvāṇa? We have noted above the Sautrāntika doctrines of 'eka-rasa-skandha', 'ārya-dharma' and the 'paramārtha-pudgala'. All these are described as existing from time immemorial without changing their nature, transmigrating from one birth to another. In the Shu-chi they are interpreted as 'extermely subtle and incomprehensible bīja'. The kuśala-dharma-bija propounded by the Kośakāra, which is also described as subtle (sūkshma) and incorruptible (na samudghāto), offers a striking resemblance to the eka-rasa-skandha, the ārya-dharma and the paramārtha-pudgala. None of these could mean a sāsrava-kuśala-bīja, for the latter is as much subject to destruction as are the akuśala-bījas. The sūkshma-kuśala-dharma-bīja of the Sautrāntika, therefore, should be understood as an anāsrava-kuśala-bīja, variously called as nirvedha-bhāgīya, or moksha-bhāgīya kuśala leadig to parinirvāna.

This conjecture is strengthened by the occurrence of such terms as moksha-bīja in the Sanskrit Buddhist Scriptures. Of the ten extraordinary powers of the Buddha[1] one is his power af fathoming the innate capacities of all beings for liberation. Illustrating this power, Yaśomitra quotes the case of a person desirous of obtaining the pravrajyā ordination. It is said that this person approached Sāriputra, but the latter could not see any roots of kuśala-mūla leading to liberation in him (moksha-bhāgīya kuśala-mūla), and therefore refused to admit him to the order. The Buddha, however, noticed it and said :

[1] Vide Adv. pp. 382ff.

moksha-bījam ahaṁ hy asya susūkshmam upalakshaye |
dhātu-pāshāṇa-vivare nilīnam iva kāñchanamṛ ||[1]

(I see his extremely subtle seed of salvation like a seam of gold hidden in metal-bearing rock.)

The use of the term moksha-bīja and of the simile of hidden gold are of great significance. The simile of gold aptly describes an incorruptible element. The moksha-bīja thus described as extermely subtle (susūkshma) and incorruptible seems to be identical with the sūkshma-kuśala-dharma-bīja propounded by the Kośakāra. Even the word dhātu used in the above verse is significant. This word also occurs in the term nānā-dhātu-jñāna-bala (Pali aneka-dhātu-nānā-dhātu-lokaṁ pajānāti) where it is understood as vāsanā, āśaya or a gotra.[2] The sarvākāra-jñatā of the Buddha consists in knowing the gotra of all beings. The doctrine of gotra forms the starting point of Mahāyāna. It determines the family of a person as belonging to the community of a śrāvaka, pratyeka-buddha or a Buddha. Yaśomitra describes this gotra as bīja,[3] which could only be the moksha-bīja cocealed in the midst of other dhātus or bījas such as of akuśala and of Sāsrava kuśala.

The theory of an innate, indestructible and pure (anāsrava) element existing in the midst of destructible, phenomenal and impure elements shows an affinity with the Mahāyāna doctrine of prakṛiti-prabhāsvara-chitta, according to which mind is essentially and originally pure but becomes impure by only adventitious afflictions. This prakṛiti-prabhāsvara-chitta is further described as identical with the dharmatā, tathatā and, therefore, with the dharma-kāya of the Buddha.[1]

This story occurs in the Mahāvagga, (Vinaya, I, p. 55) and the Dhammapada A. VI. 1(Rādhattheravatthu). In the Pali versions, however, Sāriputta ordains this person after recalling his charity of offering a spoonful of alms.

The theory of a prabhāsvara-chitta is not unknown to the Pali Scriptures. It is said in the Aṅg. nikāya: "pabhassaramidaṁ bhikkhave chittaṁ, taṁ cha kho āgantukehi upakkilesehi upakkiliṭṭhaṁ" and "......āgantukehi upakkilesehi vippamuttaṁ."[2] But the Theravādins interpret it as a bhavaṅga-chitta,[3] i.e. a paṭisandhi chitta causing a rebirth. Now a paṭisandhi-chitta can either be a kusala-vipāka or an akusala-vipāka-chitta, accompanied by the kusala-(vipāka)-mūlas like alobha, adosa or amoha or akusala-vipāka-mūlas like lobha-dosa-moha. But according to the Theravādin Abhidhamma only the kusala-vipāka chittas are sahetuka, i.e. have the mūlas. The akusala-vipāka-chitta is considered to be ahetuka, i.e. devoid of any mūlas.[4] No reason for such a discrimination is given either in the Aṭṭhakathās or in the later Tīkās. Dharmanand Kosambi, who noted this, explains that the akusala-vipāka-chitta is considered ahetuka because the akusala-mūlas do not strengthen each other.[5] The real reason for such a discrimination is perhaps, to be found in the Theravādin interpretation of the pabhassara-chitta, as a bhavaṅga-chitta. They must have thought that a pabhassara-chitta can have the kusala-mūlas (which are pure) but cannot possess the akusala-mūlas, and hence formulated a rule that the akusala-vipāka-chitta is ahetuka.

7. sarvāstivāda

The last controversy between the Koṣakāra and the Dīpakāra is on Sarvāstivāda, a fundamental principle of the Vaibhāshika school. The Kośakāra's arguments against this Vaibhāshika doctrine as contained in his Bhāshya are well known through the pioneer works of Stcherbatsky[1] and Poussin.[2] An elaborate Vaibhāshika reply to these arguments of the Kośakāra as contained in the "Shun-cheng-li-lun" (Nyāyānusāra") of Saṁghabhadra is also available to us in Poussin's other monumental work called 'Sarvāstivāda',[3] The Dīpakāra's treatment of this topic is essentially not different from that of Saṁghabhadra. But, unlike the latter, it is brief and appears like a restatement of the Vaibhāshika position given in the Bhāshya. The same Scriptures are quoted and the same arguments are advanced by the Dīpakāra. We shall, therefore, here summarise these arguments in brief and note such points that occur only in our Vṛitti.

The Dīpakāra opens his exposition by stating the four traditional theories on the Sarvāstivāda,[4] viz., bhāvānyathātva (change of existence), lakshanānyathātva (change in the aspect), avasthānyathātva (change of condition) and anyathānyathātva (= apekshā=contingency) advocated respectively by Dharmatrāta, Ghoshaka, Vasumitra and Buddhadeva. Of these, he says, Vasumitra's view is authentic because it explains the doctrine of three times with the theory of kāritra (activity).

He then advances the traditional four arguments in support of the doctrine of three times or 'universal existence': (1) The reality of past and future dharmas is spoken of in the Scriptures. (2) There can be no production of a result without an abiding past deed. (3) A perception depends on two things, viz., an object and a base. (4) There can be no cognition without an object.

After quoting several sūtras (also quoted by the Vaibhāshika in the Bhāshya) in his support, the Dīpakāra takes note of a counter-scripture advanced by the Sautrāntika. The latter maintains that a dharma cannot exist in past and future, because it is said in the Paramārtha-śūnyatā-sūtra: "When the organ of vision (eye) is produced, it does not come from some other place; when it disappears, it is not going to be stored up in another place. (consequently) a thing becomes having not been before; having become it ceases to be."[1]

This sūtra, says the Dīpakāra, was spoken of by the Buddha to refute the Vedic and the Sāṁkhya doctrines of eternal substance. It is said, for instance, in the Veda (i.e. Upanishat): "When a person dies his eye returns to the sun from which it had originated, the ear to earth, the tongue to water, the body to air and the mind to the moon."[2] The Sāṁkhyas also maintain that an eye rises from the prakṛiti and merges back into the prakṛiti. It was in refutation of these theories that the Lord said: "When the eye is produced it does not come from somewhere, etc." The Lord wanted to show that the material elements of past and future have no location in space and, therefore, there is no coming and going of these elements (in a pre-destined direction). He further wanted to refute the Sāṁkhya theory of one eternal cause. The Sāṁkhyas mainting that the prakṛiti, which is one and eternal, manifests itself as different effects by undergoing changes of its own aspects. The real purport of this sūtra is that the eye not having performed its action (in the past), becomes active (in the present). Having once been active, it abandons its activity, and thus disappears in an inactive state (called future). The Sautrāntikas, however, not knowing the true meaning of this sūtra, repeatedly rise against us like an ill-subdued ghost, only to ruin their own postition.[3]

The observation of the Dīpakāra that this sūtra was directed against the Vedic and the Sāṁkhya schools is significant. There is nothing improbable in such an assertion, for the theory of an eternal substance was chiefly advocated by these two pre-Buddhist schools. Although this explanation does not help the Vaibhāshika theory of sarvāstivāda, it certainly shows, even on the part of the early Buddhists, an understanding of the historical background in which the Buddha propounded his teachings.

The second argument of the Vaibhāshika is that the reality of a past dharma is proved by the doctrines of karma and karma-phala. If the past deeds were not to exist there will be no results which can appear only in a future time. The Sautrāntika solves this problem by postulating his theory of bīja.[1] The Dīpakāra does not enter into a detailed criticism of this theory but reminds the Kośakāra that this theory has been properly refuted (in his discussion on the kuśala-dharma-bīja).

The third Vaibhāshika argument is based on the theory that a cognition depends on two things, viz., an object and a base. The past and future objects must be real, for otherwise there could not arise cognitions corresponding to these objects. The Sautrāntika objection is that if every object of cognition were to be real, one may as well argue that even unreal things like a pudgala and a here's horn are real and existing because they too become objects of our cognition.

The Dīpakāra here points out that one should make a certain distinction between real and unreal objects. There are dharmas, termed as skandha, āyatana or dhātu which on account of having their own eternal natures are called real in an absolute sense (paramārtha-sat).[2] There are objects such as a house, a pot or a personality (pudgala) which are results of mental constructions imposed on the paramārtha dharmas. These objects exist only in a relative sense, and therefore are relatively real (saṁvṛiti-sat). When we maintain that all objects are real and existing, we bear in mind this distinction between real and nominal (or relatively real) objects. We follow a middle course (madhyamā pratipat) and maintain that dharmas are śūnya as well as aśūnya.[3]

They are śūnya becuse they are devoid of such misconceived things as pudgala (personality), ālaya-vijñāna and abhūta-parikalpa.[1] They are aśūnya because they possess individual as well as general characteristics. Thus we steer clear of the two extremes of eternalism (asti=aśūnya) and annihilationism (nāsti=śūnya), and follow a middle path preached by the Buddha, and declare that the dharmas described as skandha, āyatana or dhātu, whether past or future, are as real as they are when they are present.

The middle path described by the Dīpakāra is not new. It is a reassertion of the pudgala-śūnyatā advocated by the Hīnayāna schools. Although the main attack on the Sarvāstivāda comes from the Sautrāntika Kośakāra, the Dīpakāra's reference to the ālaya-vijñāna and to the abhūta-parikalpa unmistakably shows that his real opponents were Yogāchāra-Vijñānavādins who not only rejected the reality of past and future objects but even the distinction between a subject and object.

Indeed the Sautrāntika employs his argument of an unreal object (asad-ālambana) only as a prelude to his real theory of an objectless cognition. The objects like the five skandhas or the twelve āyatanas are real. The constructions like a pudgala, a house or a pot may be relatively real. But these do not exhaust the world of objects. One may even have a cognition of an absence (abhāva) or a negation (pratishedha) of a sixth skandha, a thirteenth āyatana, or even of a hare's horn. This would mean that bhāva as well as abhāva can become objects.[2] Since abhāva is not a thing, it follows that cognition can take place even without an object. The Sautrāntika, therefore, concludes that the cognitions of past and future objects are to be explained as cognitions without corresponding objects.

---

[1] This refers to the Yogāchāra theory of an imputed or illusory aspect of appearance. The entire world of objects is according to this school based on consciousness, and hence is unreal. The term abhūta-parikalpa occurs several times in the Laṅkāvatāra-sūtra: ...skandhā api Mahāmate sva-sāmānya-lakshaṇa-virahitā abhūta-parikalpa-lakshaṇa-vichitra-prabhāvitā bālair vikalpyante na tv āryaiḥ. p. 69. abhūta-parikalpita-svabhāva-vikalpitatvān Mahāmate anutpannāh sarva-bhāvāh. p. 62. This thought is fully developed in the Madhyāntavibhāga-sūtra of Asaṅga: abhūta-parikalpo'sti dvayaṁ tatra na vidyate. kā. 1. 1.

[2] Vide Adv. p. 271, n. 2.

The Dīpakāra notes this argument and explains the nature of a negation. A negation, he says, does not negate an existing (sat) nor a non-existing (asat) thing.[1] It does not negate a sat. For, if it could, then the kings would have destroyed their enemies by merely denying their existence. Nor does it negate an asat, for that would result only in (an affirmation of) an existence. The negation therefore negates only a known relation. When, for instance, a person says, "There is no hare's horn," he is aware of a certain relation existing between a cow and its horn. He is, therefore, not negating a non-existing hare's horn but only an existence (in the hare) of this relation found between a cow and its horn.[2] It is, there-fore, wrong to say that a negation has an abhāva as its object. All objects are bhāva (existing) and all cognitions have bhāva as their objects.

Moreover, the existence of a dharma in its past condition is proved by the expression 'jāyate' (is born). The five modifications of a dharma, viz., being (asti), changing (vipariṇamate), growth (vardhate), decay (kshīyate) and decease (vinaśyati) anticipate the prior existence of a real subject (kartā) who undergoes these modifications. Similarly the modification called birth (jāyate) anticipates the existence of a subject which is born.[3] A thing cannot be born out of nothing. Even the root jan (to be born) implies this meaning.[4] When we say a child is born we mean that it has come out of its mother's womb ; it does not mean it comes into existence at the moment of its birth. It was existing but was not born. Similarly a dharma exists in past condition but assumes a present condition and passes into a future condition, the conditions change but the dharma survives these changes.

The Sautrāntika does not accept this difference between an actor and an act, and says that in reality there are only causes capable of producing an effect, which we metaphorically call an actor (kartṛi)[1]. The Dīpakāra's reply to this objection is that the Sautrāntika cannot defend even the existence of causes or their capacity to produce an effect. According to the Sautrāntika, a destruction is inherent in every dharma. Consequently, a dharma can be neither born, nor subsist, nor produce an effect. How does he then account either for a cause or for an effect? A causal relation is possible only between two existing dharmas (like past and present and present and future) and not between two unreals or between a real and an unreal.[2]

This discussion on the reality of pratyayas (causes) brings the Dīpakāra to a criticism of the Vaitulika, also called vaināśika (annihilationist) on account of his rejection of the reality of not only the past and future but also of the present dharmas.[3] It is his contention that a saṁskṛita dharma, being a result of pratyayas is devoid of an inherent nature, and, therefore, of a reality. Such a dharma cannot subsist either wholly or in parts in its causes, nor can it subsist anywhere else. That which is not found to subsist anywhere is devoid of its own nature. All dharmas, therefore, are illusory and empty like a circle of fire (alāta-chakra).[4]

The Vaitulika view given above is identical with the śūnyavāda of the Mādhyamika. The arguments of the Vaitulika correspond to Nāgārjuna's polemic against the reality of pratyayas and saṁskṛita dharmas as contained in his Mādhyamika-kārikāas.[5] This is further confirmed by the Dīpakāra's description of the Vaitulika as a vaināśika (annihilationist) and ayoga-śūnyatā-vādin.

The term ayoga-śūnyatā is not found in the traditional lists of 18, 19 or 20 kinds of śūnyatās,[6] or in the Mādhyamika or the Yogāchāra treatises. It is found only in our Vṛitti, where it is once attributed to the Vaitulika and once to the Kośakāra. We have noted above an accusation brought against the Kośakāra of heading for the precipice of ayoga-śūnyatā. The Kośakāra had favoured a Sautrāntika view that "there is no such thing as a seer or a seen. There are only dharmas called cause and effect which in reality are free from any activity."[1] The term ayoga-śūnyatā refers there to this theory of nirvyāpāra-dharma-mātratā which effectually denied the theory of pratyayas and of their interdependent activities. The same idea is developed in the śūnyavāda of the Mādhyamika which maintains that dharmas (both pratyaya and phala) are devoid of any activity because they are devoid of an inherent nature. This theory is also found in the Yogāchāra-Vijñānavāda school. The Laṅkāvatāra-sūtra, for instance, says that bodhisattvas by their descent (penetration) of the doctrine of pure mind and by being free from (the thought of) the relation of production and action (utpāda-kriyā-yoga-virahitāḥ) attain the body of the Buddha.[2] The term utpāda-kriyā-yoga is followed by a similar phrase, viz., 'hetu-pratyaya-kriyā-yoga'.[3] It seems certain that the term yoga is used here for the causal relation between a pratyaya and pratyaya-samutpanna. The denial of which is ayoga. The term ayoga-śyunyatā can, therefore, be understood as ayoga eva sūnyatā, and thus can refer to the śunyavāda of both the Mādhyamika and Vijñānavāda Buddism.

The Dīpakāra dismisses this as a piece of dialectic hardly to be taken seriously (brahmodyam etat). Since, he says, this polemic is applicable only to those dharmas which are produced by pratyayas.[4] A thing like a forest, for instance, exists only in a conventional sense, because it is produced by a multitude of causes. But the dharmas like the skandha and āyatana have their innate eternal natures, which are not produced by any pratyayas.[1] The pratyayas produce only different conditions, powers, forms and actions in these self-existing dharmas. Consequently the dharmas are real in an absolute sense, whereas the conditions like past, present and future are temporary, produced by causes, and, therefore, are relatively real. A dharma is like a crown prince. The pratyayas are like his ministers. The ministers do not produce a new person when they anoint him as a king, but only confer the royalty on him at a particular time. Similarly a dharma exists at all times but becomes present, i.e. active when it is assisted by the totality of causes and conditions.[2] The Dīpakāra further supports this theory by quoting Kumāralāta's example of motes in the sunlight. The motes exist everywhere but only those are visible which are in the sunlight. Others are known only by inference.[3] Similarly a dharma exists in present as well as past and future times. But only its present condition is visible, the other conditions are inferable.

[4] Adv. p. 277.

Confronted with a quotation from a Dārshṭāntika teacher like Kumāralāta, the Sautrāntika amends his position and says that he does not dismiss the past and future dharmas as totally non-existing. They exist in a conventional sense as relatively real dharmas but they do not exist as dravya, as absolute reals.[4]

The Dīpakāra does not accept even this amended position. He says that such a theory will hold good only if one can prove that reality of present on which one can base the relative reality of the past and future. A prajñapti dharma cannot exist without a reference to some paramārtha dharma.[5] The reality of present cannot be established without the reality of past, for it will involve the production of something out of nothing, a thesis which has been properly refuted (in the discussion of the Paramārtha-śūnyatā-sūtra).

The Kośakāra here points out the absurdity in the Vaibhāshika contention that 'a dharma exists in three times but is endowed with activity (kāritra) only on obtaining the totality of conditions (pratyaya-sāmagrī). For surely, he says, even the pratyayas are dharmas, and must be considered as always existing. It is wrong, therefore, to say that a dharma is past when it has ceased to be active, is present when it is active, and is future when it is not endowed with activity. Moreover, what is this kāritra? Is it identical with or different from the dharma? If it is identical then it is always existing. Consequently there will be no distinction of times. If it is different, then it becomes a separate dharma and thus will require an explanation in its turn. If it requires another kāritra then the whole process will result in an infinite regress. Thus the Vaibhāshika contention of the sarvāstivāda is untenable whether judged by scriptures or by reason. Novertheless, the Vaibhāshikas maintain that the past and future exist because the nature of dharmas (dharmatā) is deep; it cannot be explained.

The Kośakāra gives these arguments in a kārikā[1] consisting of questions and answers. The Dīpakāra also imitates this style and refutes the Kośakāra.[2] Read together these two kārikās appear like argumentations between two rivals engaged in a debate. After reminding the Kośakāra that the depth of the words of the Buddha cannot be understood by mere speculation, the Dīpakāra sets forth the nature of kāritra (activity). The projection of a result (phalākshepa) by a dharma endowed with a potency gained by the totality of internal and external conditions is called kāritra. Since this happens only when a (future) dharma arrives in its present state, its activity in the present moment is called kāritra.[3]

The Dīpakāra's definition of kāritra is identical with Saṁghabhadra's definition quoted in the Tattva-saṅgraha-Pañjikā.[1] The latter contains an elaborate examination of the doctrine of sarvāstivāda.[2] The main arguments given there are not different from those found in the Bhāshya. But it contains a detailed exposition of kāritra, particularly on its relation to a dharma. The Dīpakāra says that kāritra is not different from a dharma,[3] but does not meet the questions of the Kośakāra on the problems arising out of this position. Saṁghabhadra, however, gives the following explanation:[4] kāritra is not different from the dharma, as it is not found to have any nature apart from that. Nor is it the dharma only; because even though it forms its very nature, it is non-existent at some time (i.e. in past and future). It is, therefore, like santati which is neither identical with nor different from the individual units of the five skandhas. Nor can it be said that it does not exist because its effects are found to exist. But it is not a dharma, for in that case even a single moment will be called a santati. The same arguments apply to the existence of a kāritra. For it has been said: it is admitted that there are effects of the santati, and yet the santati, as such, is nowhere existent (by itself, apart from the entity); similar should be understood to be the case with kāritra bringing about differences of times (states).[5]

It appears from this explanation that the neo-Vaibhāshikas, under the influence of the criticism of the Kośakāra considerably modified their theory of kāritra, and thus compromised their position on the reality of the past and future dharmas. By comparing kāritra with santati Saṁghabhadra virtually reduces the reality of the past and future dharmas, and thus relegates them to the status of a prajñapti dharma like pudgala. The Dīpakāra, however, does not show any acquaintance with this development. He follows in his usual dogmatic manner a more orthodox position of the sarvāstivāda.

Having thus examined the arguments of the Sautrāntika Kośakāra, and having criticised the views of the Vaināśika (Sūnyavādin) Vaitulika, the Dīpakāra once more turns to the Kośakāra. "The Vaitulika, apostate from the Sarvāstivāda,[1] says: 'We too advocate (imagine) three svabhāvas'. To him we should reply: the world is full of such illusions which please only fools......these three svabhāvas imagined by you have been rejected already. Such other illusions should also be thrown away. This is one more occasion where the Kośakāra shows his ignorance of (the doctrine of) Time."[2]

The term Vaitulika in this passage most certainly refers to the Vijñānavādin Kośakāra who formulated the theory of three svabhāvas, viz., parikalpita, paratantra and parinishpanna. This doctrine found in the Laṅkāvatāra-sūtra and in the works of Maitreya and Asanga is fully developed by Vasubandhu in his Tri-svabhāva-nirdeśa. The Dīpakāra's accusation that the Kośakāra is heading for the precipice of ayoga-śūnyatā, his criticism that the Kośakāra is entering the protals of the Vaitulika scriptures and finally his statement that the Kośakāra having deviated from Sarvāstivāda advocates the doctrine of tri-svabhāva confirms the traditional account preserved in Paramārtha's 'Life of Vasubandhu' that the Kośakāra Vasubandhu was converted to Mahāyāna and became a leading exponent of Vijñānavāda Buddhism.[3]

DATE AND AUTHORSHIP

The controversies between the Dīpakāra and the Kośakāra discussed in the foregoing chapter lead one to believe that the Dīpa and the Vṛitti were written primarily with the ambition of presenting a rival treatise to the celebrated Kośa and the Bhāshya, and at the same time with the aim of refuting the views of the Sautrāntika Kośakāra leaning more and more towards Mahāyāna. The Dīpakāra's declaration that he will propound the essence of Abhidharma forgotten by the Kośakāra, his description of the latter as an apostate from the Sarvāstivāda, and his condemnation of him as a conceited person (paṇḍita-mānin)[1] ignorant of the Abhidharma (abhidharma-paroksha-mati-vṛittīnām)[2] betray a certain rivalry entertained by him towards Vasubandhu the Kośakāra. By calling the latter's views unbuddhistic (abauddhīya) based on the Vaitulika scriptures leading to the doctrine of ayoga-śūnyatā, he apparently tries to persuade us over and over again that the Kośa is not an authentic Vaibhāshika treatise but only a mouth-piece of the Mahāyānist Vasubandhu disguised as a Vaibhāshika āchārya.

Unfortunately, the name of this rival has not survived either in the Dīpa or in the Vṛitti. In the Vṛitti he is merely called Dīpakāra as Vasubandhu is called Kośakāra. He is a Kāśmīra Vaibhāshika as is evident from his criticism of the Bahirdeśīyaka view of the four avyākṛita-mūlas in preference to the theory of three held by the Kāśmīra school.[3] He is an orthodox Vaibhāshika. Many of his views are identical with those of Saṁghabhadra, and in some cases they are expressed in almost identical terms. We can see this identity in their definitions of a dravya-paramāṇu,[1] the saṁskāras like prāpti[2] and sabhāgatā,[3] the terms like mata,[4] mada,[5] dhātu,[6] in their views on the relation between vitarka and vichāra,[7] ṛiddhi and samādhi,[8] and on the nature of kāritra, the three vidyās[9] and finally on the theory of bīja.[10] Despite this identity of views, the Dīpakāra makes no direct or indirect reference to Saṁghabhadra or to the latter's famous works, viz., the "Nyāyānusāra" and the "Samaya-pradīpikā". The Buddhist āchāryas referred to by him, viz., (ārya) Maitreya, Aśvaghosha, (bhadanta) Kumāralāta, Vasumitra, Ghoshaka, Dharmatrāta and Buddhadeva, and the non-Buddhist āchāryas, viz., Kapila, Akshapāda, Ulūka, Kanāda, Vyāsa, Vṛishagaṇa and Vindhyavāsin, all belong to a period prior to the compilation of the Kośa.

Our main sources for the knowledge of the Dīpakāra, therefore, are all external. But even these are disappointing, because, to the best of our knowledge, neither the Dīpa nor the Vṛitti seem to have been known to the contemporaries or to the successors of the Kośakāra Vasubandhu. Tradition as preserved in Paramārtha's 'Life of Vasubandhu' knows of only one (Vaibhāshika) rival to the Kośakāra, viz., Saṁghabhadra, and attributes to him only two works, viz., the "Nyāyānusāra" and the "Samaya-pradīpikā", which are commentaries on the Kośa and not entirely independent works like our Dīpa. Yaśomitra who quotes large passages from the "Nyāyānusāra" and criticises the views of Saṁghabhadra (and also several other āchāryas like Anantavarman, Guṇamati, Devaśarman, Rāma, etc.) markes not a single reference either to the Dīpakāra or to the Dīpa, Vṛitti, or to the Tattva-saptati which as noted above was also a work by the author of the Vṛitti. Neither the works of the post-Vasubandhu āchāryas like Dīgnāga, Dharmakīrti, Śāntrakshita and Kamalaśīla (which contain an occasional criticism of the Vaibhāshika), nor the works of the Chinese historians like Hsuan Tsang or the Tibetan historians like Tārānātha and Buston, nor the extant collections of the Chinese and Tibetan Tripiṭaka show any acquaintance with these three works or with the name Dīpakāra.

It is not possible, in these circumstances, to arrive at any decisive conclusions on the authorship of the Dīpa, and consequently of the Vṛitti. For, as in the case of the Kośa and the Bhāshya, the Dīpa and the Vṛitti too appear to be the works of one and the same author. The kārikā text (Dīpa) as well as the Vṛitti are both critical of the Kośakāra. The former refers to him only indirectly by calling him 'paṇḍita-mānin',[1] and by referring to the theory of tri-svabhāva as an imagination capable of pleasing only fools.[2] The Vṛitti makes direct references to the Kośakāra. The Vṛitti on the kārikā consisting of questions and answers on the Sarvāstivāda[3] (between the Kośakāra and the Dīpakāra) amply proves the identity of the author of the Dīpa and the Vṛitti. The author of the Vṛitti, commenting on the answer part of this kārikā refers to himself in the first person, e.g., vayam brūmaḥ, vayam āchakshmaḥ and vayam prativadmaḥ.[4]

In the absence of positive evidence we are left with only conjecture regarding the identification of the Dīpakāra. It is very tempting to identify him with Saṁghabhadra. Both belong to the orthodox Kāśmīra Vaibhāshika school. Both hold identical views on almost all controversial points between the Vaibhāshika and the Sautrāntika. Both were rivals of the Kośakāra, and composed their works in refutation of the latter. Nevertheless, it is most unlikely that Saṁghabhadra could have been the author of the Dīpa. Having composed two major works (viz. the "Nyāyānusāra" and the "Samaya-pradīpikā") against the Bhāshya, he could hardly have ventured on a third work. The tradition would have known it. The Vṛitti, instead of referring to the Tattvasaptati (or in addition to it wold have referred to either or one of his better known works. It is, therefore, more likely that the Dīpa was a work of one of Samghabhadra's followers who carried on the tradition of his opposition to the Kośakāra.

In this connection, Hsüan Tsang's account of āchārya Vimalamitra, a disciple of Saṁghabhadra, is of great significance. After relating the disputes between Vasubandhu (the Kośakāra) and Saṁghabhadra, Hsüan Tsang gives the following account of āchārya Vimalamitra :[1]

> "Saṁghabhadra having died, they burnt his body and collected his bones, and in a stūpa attached to the saṁghārāma, 200 paces or so to the north-west, in a wood of Āmra trees, they are yet visible.
> "Beside the Āmra wood is a stūpa in which are relics of the bequeathed body of the master of śāstras Vimalamitra (pi-mo-lo-mi-to-lo) (wou hau yau). This master of the śāstras was a man of Kāśmīr. He became a disciple and attached himself to the Sarvāstivāda school. He had read a multitude of sūtras and investigated various śāstras ; he travelled through the five Indies and made himself acquainted with the mysterious literature of the three Piṭakas. Having established a name and accomplished his work, being about to retire to his own country, on his way he passed near the stūpa of Saṁghabhadra, the master of śāstras. Putting his hand (on it), he sighed and said, 'This master was truly distinguished, his views pure and eminent. After having spread abroad the great principles (of his faith), he purposed to overthrow those of other schools and lay firmly the fabric of his own. Why then should his fame be not eternal ? I, Vimalamitra, foolish though I am, have received at various times the knowledge of the deep principles of his departed wisdom ; his distinguished qualities have been cherished through successive generations. Vasubandhu, though dead, yet lives in the tradition of the school. That which I know so perfectly (ought to be preserved). I will write, then, such śāstras as will cause the learned men of Jambudvīpa to forget the name of the Great Vehicle and destroy the fame of Vasubandhu. This will be an immortal work, and will be the accomplishment of my long-meditated design.'
> "Having finished these words, his mind became confused and wild ; his boastful tongue heavily protruded, whilst the hot blood flowed forth. Knowing that his end was approaching, he wrote the following letter to signify his repentance :— 'The doctrines of > the Great Vehicle......contain the final principles......I foolishly dared to attack its distinguished teachers. The reward of my works is plain to all. It is for this I die......' Then the great earth shook again as he gave up life. In the place where he died the earth opened, and there was produced a great ditch. His disciples burnt his body, collected his bones, and raised over them (a stūpa).

> "At this time there was an Arhat who, having witnessed his death, sighed and exclaimed, ...'Today this master of śāstras yielding to his feelings and maintaining his own views, abusing the Great Vehicle, has fallen into the deepest hell (Avīchi)'"

The account given above has several points of interest in our task of identifying the Dīpakāra. Vimalamitra is said to be a Kāśmirian, a Sarvāstivādin, a master of śāstras (i.e. Abhidharma), who entertains an ambition to "destroy the fame of Vasubandhu" in favour of his (distant) teacher Saṁghabhadra. All these points are favourable in identifying him with the Dīpakāra. It is true that the account says nothing about his works.[1] But this must have been forgotten by the Mahāyānists in their zeal for condemning him for entertaining an ambition against Vasubandhu.

Indeed, the latter part of Hsüan Tsang's account looks more like fiction than history. It may well be that Vimalamitra repented his ill will towards Vasubandhu. But the account of the manner in which he meets his death, particularly the vomiting of hot blood,[2] and his descent into the "deepest hell" may be taken as a Mahāyānist way of denouncing their opponents. The fact that a stūpa was built over him and that his relics were enshrined near those of Saṁghabhadra is sufficient to point out some eminent part played by this āchārya in upholding the orthodox Vaibhāshika tenets as outlined by Saṁghabhadra. He may well have been our Dīpakāra whose works were forgotten in course of time partly, perhaps, in favour of Saṁghabhadra's monumental and more authoritative works against the Kośakāra.

[1] In the Catalogue of the Tib tan Buddhist Canons (by Prof. H. Ui and others, Tôhoku Imperial University, Japan, 1934) several works on dhāraṇī (see Nos. 2092, 2681, 3112, 3814, etc). are attributed to one Vimalamitra. But it is hardly possible that this person could have been the āchārya Vimalamitra referred to by Hsüan Tsang.

[2] Cf. atha kho Nigaṇṭhassa Nāthaputtassa bhagavato sakkāraṁ asahamānassa tattheva uṇhaṁ lohitaṁ mukhato uggañchhī'ti. Majjhima, (sutta 56), Vol. II, p. 387.

The identification of the Dīpakāra with Vimalamitra could also be helpful in determining an approximate date of the Dīpa. Vimalamitra is not a contemporary either of the Kośakāra or of Saṁghabhadra, as he says that the latter's "qualities have been cherished through successive generations." It is not possible to determine the generations that separated Saṁghabhadra from Vimalamitra. But these could not have been many, for the memories of the dispute between the Kośakāra and Saṁghabhadra are still fresh in the minds of (the generation of) Vimalamitra. Moreover, he must have flourished much earlier than Hsüng's Tsang's visit to India, i.e. 629 A.D. The lower and upper limits of the date of Vimalamitra can thus be fixed between the dates of the Kośakāra and of Hsüan Tsang.

The date of (the Kośakāra) Vasubandhu is yet uncertain. Some place him in the middle of the fourth century and some in the fifth century A.D.[1] But whether he is placed in the fourth or in the fifth century, it is unlikely that Vimalamitra can be placed beyond a hundred years after the Kośakāra's death. The approximate date of Vimalamitra could thus be somewhere between 450 and 550 A.D. or even much earlier.

The same date can hold good for the composition of the Dīpa. As we have noted above, all the āchāryas referred to by the Dīpakāra belong to the pre-Kośakāra period. No new doctrinal developments such as are found in the works of the post-Vasubandhu period are recorded in the Vṛitti. Indeed, the Dīpakāra's criticism of the Kośakāra, and particularly his argumentations in defence of the Sarvāstivāda give an impression of their being contemporaries. We have no means of establishing any precise date, but one thing looks certain, that the date of the Dīpa could hardly be extended beyond a hundred years (or a few generations) after the Kośakāra, a date which we have assigned to āchārya Vimalamitra.

[1] Professor E. Frauwallner has given a complete bibliography on this problem in his monograph On the Date of the Buddhist Master of Law Vasubandhu (Serie Orientale Roma, III), Roma, 1951. Also see my article 'On the Theory of two Vasubandhus' in the BSOAS, XXI, 1, 1958, pp. 48-53.

Restorations and Emendations :

The MS. is fairly correct and needed very little correction. In doubtful places and where the MS. was erased or broken, and where the photographs were not clear, we have restored the text with the help of the Sakv. and the press-copy of Professor Pradhan's edition of the Bhāshya. All these restorations are given in square brackets. A few letters (two or three) of the first line of a large number of folios are lost under the drawing pins used by the photographer in pinning the palm-leaves. The restorations of these letters are also given in square brackets.

The emendations are given in round brackets. The majority of these emendations consist of a change of the letter ṇa into na or vice versa. The rules of cerebralisation of na are not generally ovserved. We may note here a few cases of such irregularity :

(A) Words where the dental na is used instead of cerebral na :— apramāna (p. 287), aprahīna (p. 238), abhinishkramana (p. 274), āvenika (p. 80), Airāvana (p. 389), kriyamāna[1] (p. 69), gauna (p. 367), Nārāyana (pp. 14, 101), nirvāna (p. 364), paramānu (p. 65), prahāna[2] (p. 238), prahīna[3] (p. 28), lakshana (p. 417), lavana (p. 77), vakshyamāna (p. 193), śonita (p. 274), śrāmanera (p. 130), śrāmanyaphala (p. 57), etc.

(B) Words where cerebral ṇa is used instead of dental na :— aṇārya (p. 89), aṇāsrava (p. 365), abhilapaṇa (p. 20), kīrtaṇa (p. 83), gagaṇa (p. 13), ṇiśraya (p. 12), ṇishyandaphala (p. 177), ṇirodha (p. 289), ṇirvāṇa (p. 136), pariṇidarshaṇa, daurmaṇasya,[4] nirvartaṇa (p. 136), pariṇirvāṇa (p. 339), pariṇirvita (p. 426), pāṇa (pp. 12, 128),

---

[1] Also kriyamāṇa (p. 259).

[2] Also prahāṇa (pp. 146-7).

[3] Also prahīṇa (p. 147).

[4] These two words are always spelt in this way.

pravartaṇa (p. 50), mahāyāṇa (p. 358), yoṇiśo manasikāra (p. 296), rachaṇā (p. 192), vivarjaṇa (p. 46), śrāvakayāṇa (p. 358), hīṇa (p. 384), etc.

Similar irregularities are found in the case of inflexions :—

(1) Nominative case—trīni (p. 23), dravyāni (p. 405), nāmāṇi (p. 120), balāṇi[1] (p. 357), mauneyāṇi (p. 150), viśishṭāṇi (p. 45), sarvāni (p. 54), etc.

(2) Instrumental case—atyayeṇa (p. 132), aśaikshena (p. 23), upachayeṇa (p. 374), kramena (p. 23), parivartiṇā (p. 412), pratyayeṇa (p. 412), mārgena[2] (p. 57), saṁgrahena (p. 8), etc.

(3) Genitive case—indriyānām (pp. 6, 34, etc.), kāryānām (p. 38), Kauravānām (p. 91), pramukhānām (p. 86), mūrtāṇām (p. 15), yogiṇām (p. 20), shannām (p. 213), etc.

It can be seen from these examples that there is a tendency to cerebralise the na when it is in the proximity of ra. This tendency can be fully observed in combinations like anayor ṇāsti (p. 344), adibhir ṇāmabhiḥ (p. 38), chatvāro ṇikāyāḥ (p. 288), chittayor aṇyatarat (p. 46), trayor aṇiyaṃah (p. 40), puṇar etc. (p. 40), viśuddhir aṇāsravaiḥ (p. 49), etc., and compounds like chāṇūra-ṇārāyaṇa (p. 389), dushṭa-ṇigraha (p. 154), dharma-ṇirvachana (p. 44), vaira-ṇiryātana (p. 154), svara-ṇirghosha (p. 189), etc.

It is not possible to decide whether these irregularities are to be attributed to the Dīpakāra or to the scribe of our MS. Judging by the chaste and cultured language of our text and the knowledge of the Sanskrit grammar it exhibits in its discussions on the formation of several terms,[3] it seems unlikely that the Dīpakāra would commit such inconsistent violations of the rules of grammar. These irregularities appear to be the result of a faulty MS. tradition, possibly due to the scribe or scribes following the dialectal peculiarities of their native land.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

In editing the Abhidharma-dīpa I have received invaluable help from my colleagues both in India and in Britain The work was undertaken at the instance of my revered teacher Pandit Sukhalalji Sanghavi. The late Acharaya Narendra Deva, who evinced a keen interest in Abhidharma studies, directed me towards a comparative study of the Dīpa with the Abhidharma-kośa-bhāshya of Vasubandhu. This was made possible by the generosity of Professor Prahlad Pradhan who kindly gave me access to his press-copy of the Abhidharma-kośa-bhāshya. I am deeply grateful to Professor A. S. Altekar, the General Editor of the Tibetan Sanskrit Works Series for his permission to quote and print passages from the above work in the present edition of Dīpa.

The editing and printing of the text was almost complete in 1956, when I left the Hindu University, Banaras, to join the School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London, where I wrote the Introduction under the supervision of Professor J. Brough. In the course of these studies, I have received valuable help from many of my colleagues in the School, notably Professor W. Simon, Dr. D. Snellgrove, Dr. D. Friedman, Mr. J. E. B. Gray, and Dr. R. E. Asher. I have also received helpful suggestion from Professor T. R. V. Murti of the Hindu University, Banaras, Professor J. W. De Jong of Leiden, and Dr. Edward Conze. To all these I offer my sincere thanks.

Finally I should like to express my deep sense of gratitude to my exteemed friend Pandit Dalsukh Malvania of the Hindu University, Banaras, who was associated from the beginning with the editing and without whose help the task would not have been brought to a successful conclusion.

The whole work was submitted as a thesis for the Ph.D. Degree of the University of London. Lack of space has prevented me from publishing the whole Introduction. What appears here may be supplemented by the following articles in the Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies : (i) 'On the theory of two Vasubandhus' (Vol. XXI, Part, 1, 1958) ;(ii) 'The Buddha's prolongation of life' (Vol. XXI, Part 3, 1958); (iii) 'The Vaibhāshika theory of Words and Meanings' (Vol. XXII, Part 1, 1959). It is interesting to note that the Adv. here identifies the Kośakāra with the Sautrāntika. For an elucidation of this view of Sautrāntika, see Th. Stcherbatsky: The Central Conception of Buddhism, p. 62.

[3] This statement is very significant. It proves the authenticity of a tradition that the Kośakāra was a Vaibhāshika before he became a Mahāyānist.

On this controversy, LVP. says : "Le Dārshṭāntika et le Vibhajyavādin soutiennent qu'une pensée subtile n'est pas interrompue dans le recueillement d'arrêt. The Theravādins hold that the Jīvitendriya is twofold : Rūpa-jīvitendriya and Arūpa-jīvitendriya. A controversy about such division is recorded in the the Kv. VIII. 10. The KvA. gives some interesting information about the theory of its being a Viprayukta-dharma:—इदानि जीवितिन्द्रियकथा नाम होति । तत्थ येसं जीवितिन्द्रियं नाम चित्तविप्पयुत्तो अरूपधम्मो, तस्मा रूपजीवितिन्द्रियं नत्थीति लद्धि, सेय्यथापि पुब्बसेलियानञ्चेव सम्मितीयानञ्च ।···नत्थि रूपीनं धम्मानं आयूति पञ्हे उपादिन्नरूपानम्पि तिणकट्ठादीनम्पि सन्तानवसेन पवत्तिमेव आयु, ठिति यपना यापना इरियना वत्तना पालनाति इच्छति, तस्मा पटिक्खिपति । ···अत्थि अरूपजीवितिन्द्रियं ति पञ्हे अरूपधम्मानं चित्तविप्पयुत्तं जीवितिन्द्रियसन्तानं नाम अत्थीति इच्छति, तस्मा पटिजानाति···। KvA. VIII. 10.

[४] While discussing a topic “कतीन्द्रियाणि विपाकः कति न विपाकः?”, the Kośakāra deals with a sub-topic :—अथ यदर्हन् भिक्षुरायुः संस्कारान् स्थापयति तज्जीवितेन्द्रियं कस्य विपाकः? and gives the following views :—*

*(१) शास्त्र उक्तं "कथमायुः संस्कारान् स्थापयति ? अर्हन् भिक्षुः ऋद्धिमांश्चेतोवशित्वं प्राप्तः संघाय वा पुद्गलाय वा…जीवितपरिष्कारं वा दत्वा तत् प्रणिधाय प्रान्तकोटिकं चतुर्थध्यानं समापद्यते । स च तस्मात् व्युत्थाय चित्तमुत्पादयति…यन्मे भोगविपाकं तदायुर्विपाकं भवत्विति । तस्य यत् भोगविपाकं तदायुर्विपाकं भवति ।

Then the Kośakāra gives his own view :—एवन्तु भवितव्यम् । समाधिप्रभाव एव स तेषां तादृशो ये पूर्वकर्मजं च स्थितिकालावेधमिन्द्रियमहाभूतानां व्यावर्तयन्त्यपूर्वं च समाधिजमावेधमाक्षिपन्ति । तस्मान्न तज्जीवितेन्द्रियं विपाकं ततोऽन्यत्तु विपाकः । Akb. II. 10 a.

This controversy seems to arise from the legend of Buddha's declaration to Ānanda : 'यस्स कस्सचि आनन्द चत्तारो इद्धिपादा भाविता बहुलीकता यानिकता वत्थुकता अनुट्ठिता परिचिता सुसमारद्धा, सो आकङ्खमानो कप्पं वा तिट्ठेय्य कप्पावसेसं वा । तथागतस्स खो आनन्द, चत्तारो इद्धिपादा…सुसमारद्धा । आकङ्खमानो आनन्द तथागतो कप्पं वा तिट्ठेय्य कप्पावसेसं वा'ति । Dīgha. xvi. 3, 3.

This controversy is recorded in the Kathāvatthu. There also a similar question is raised—whether this extended āyu is iddhimayika or vipāka ?

इद्धिबलेन समन्नागतो कप्पं तिट्ठेय्याति ?

The Kośakāra explains the difference between the āyu-saṁskāra and the jīvita-saṁskāra as below :—सूत्र उक्तम्—'भगवान् जीवितसंस्कारानधिष्ठायायुःसंस्कारानुत्सृष्टवान् । तेषां को विशेषः ? न कश्चिदित्येके ।…पूर्वकर्मफलमायुःसंस्काराः।

[1] The Akb. II. 10 a (विपाको जीवितम् ।) contains a long discussion on the problem of Buddha's power to extend his life for a Kalpa. The belief in this particular power of Buddha is pretty old as is evidenced from the passage of the Mahāparinibbāna-sutta. (v. supra, p. 99. n.) But according to the Theravādins, the kalpa in this passage meant only an Āyu-kalpa and not the Mahākalpa. The Commentary on this passage says :—एत्थ च कप्पं ति आयुकप्पं,तस्मि तस्मि काले यं मनुस्सानं आयुप्पमाणं होति तं परिपुण्णं करोन्तो तिट्ठेय्य, कप्पावसेसं ति 'अप्पो वा भिय्यो' ति वुत्तवस्ससततो अतिरेकं वा । महासीवत्थेरो पनाह:—बुद्धानं अट्ठाने गज्जितं नाम नत्थि···इदं भद्दकप्पमेव तिट्ठेय्य । कस्मा पन न ठितोति ? उपादिन्नकसरीरं नाम खण्डिच्चादीहि अभिभूयति, बुद्धा च खण्डिच्चादिभावं अप्पत्वा···पियमनापकाले येव परिनिब्बायन्ति ।"··· एवं वुत्तेपि यो पन रुच्चति, आयुकप्पो ति इदमेव अट्ठकथायं नियामितं । *Dīgha A.*xvi.3,3.

[1] The beginning portion of the II pāda is lost in the lost folios. (V. supra, p. 122. n. 1.) [2] V. infra, Adv. kārikā 169.

[3] The problem under discussion is upavāsa-saṁvara. A question is raised, whether a layman (upāsaka) practising the upavāsa, can be said to be in possession of the upavāsa-saṁvara, even without his declaration of its acceptance in a prescribed ceremonial form? The Kośakāra explains this:—

किं खल्वयमुपवासकस्यैव आहोस्विदन्यस्यापि ? अन्यस्याप्युपवासोऽस्ति शरणं त्वगतस्य न । अनुपवासकोऽपि यस्तमहोरात्रं बुद्धधर्मसंघान् शरणं गत्वोपवासं गृह्णाति तस्योत्पद्यते उपवाससंवरो नान्यथा । Akb. IV. 30 ab. This raises a further question whether one becomes Upavāsaka merely by the Tri-saraṇa-gamana? तत् किं शरणगमनादेवोपवासको भवति ? भवतीति बहिर्देशिकाः । न विना संवरेणेति काश्मीराः । उपासकत्वोपगमात्संवृदुक्तिस्तु भिक्षुवत् । उपासकत्वाभ्युपगमादेवास्योपवासकसंवरो जायते । …न तु विना संवरेणोपवासकोऽस्ति । Ibid. 30 cd.

[4] The eight nikāyas refer to the eight kinds of the प्रातिमोक्षसंवर :— भिक्षुसंवर, भिक्षुणीसंवर, शिक्षमाणसंवर, श्रामणेरसंवर, श्रामणेरिकासंवर,, उपासकसंवर,

[५] It is interesting to note that only the First Council is referred to here, instead of the traditional three or four Councils.

[६] Uddāna means summary, brief statement, especially of the contents of a longer literary work or passage. In Pāli nikāyas, at the end of a chapter are given verses summarizing the contents of the chapter. (e. g., सेखबलवग्गो पठमो । तस्स उद्दानं···Aṅg. III. p. 9.) Uddāna-gāthā would therefore mean a collection of such gāthās. See BHSD. p. 130.

[७] The controversies regarding the authenticity of Buddhist scriptures date back as early as the First Buddhist Council. The four Mahāpadesas or Authorities mentioned in the Mahāparinibbāna sutta (V. supra, p. 100, n. 1.) point to the existence of various versions of the Buddhavachana. The nidānakathā of Aṭṭhasālinī contains a long debate on the authenticity of the Abhidharma-sūtra :···'अभिधम्मसुत्तं न वट्टती' ति ? 'अभिधम्मो केन भासितो ति ? 'न एसो बुद्धभासितो' ति । DhsA. I. 70. Buddhaghosha refers to the Vedalla-piṭaka i.e., the Mahāyāna-scriptures, (V. supra, p. 100, n. 3.) and declares them to be unauthentic. For the claims of authenticity made by the Mahāyānists for their scriptures, see the following :—
